MAN'S SUFFERING IN LOVE—VOLUME II

The Profane Feminine

Reflections on a Side of Woman That Nobody Wants to Face

By Nessahan Alita

Citation data:

ALITA, Nessahan (2005). The Profane Feminine: Reflections on a Side of Woman That Nobody Wants to Face. In: Man's Suffering in Love—Vol. II. Independent online edition of 2008.

Abstract:

Women have a sacred side and a profane side. The profane side consists in the use of emotional intelligence for selfish ends in the field of love, with the aim of receiving as much love as possible from men and giving back the minimum necessary and possible.

Keywords:

romantic relationships - emotional aggression - gender issues - sexuality

ATTENTION!

This is a free book. If you paid for it, you were robbed.

There are no supplements, other versions, or other editions that are authorized or being sold. All versions other than this one are unauthorized and may have been tampered with.

You DO NOT HAVE PERMISSION to sell, edit, insert comments into, enlarge, reduce, tamper with, plagiarize, translate, insert images into, or make this book commercially available anywhere. No alteration of its content, language, or title is authorized.

Respect copyright.

Warning

This work should be read in a spirit of humor and solidarity, never in a spirit of revolt.

This book teaches the art of dismantling and neutralizing female wiles in love and how to protect oneself against the emotional damage of passion, and it cannot be invoked as an incentive for, or as support for, any other acts. Its critical, direct, ironic, and incisive tone reflects only the pointing out of flaws, errors, and wiles, and does not signify support for any negative feelings.

The wiles denounced, unmasked, and described here correspond to feminine expressions, largely unconscious, of behavioral traits common to both genders. The profile outlined corresponds to a specific type of woman: the one who is ruled by sentimental selfishness. The author makes no pronouncement on the percentage of incidence of this profile among the female population of the various countries.

Nor does the author accept responsibility for misinterpretations, biased readings, undue generalizations, or intentional distortions that may be made under any pretext whatsoever, nor for misuse of this knowledge. Those who distort it or use it improperly will have to answer for their acts alone.

The Profane Feminine

Reflections on a side of woman that nobody wants to face

By Nessahan Alita

Contents:

Introduction
1. The danger of getting it all wrong
2. Why they don’t look at you
3. The privileges
4. Mothers, wives, and daughters
5. Why they are the opposite of what they confess
6. The capricious judgments
7. The value of silence
8. The duplicity of feelings
9. Shattering the little emotional hells
10. The strategy of attacking masculinity
11. How they undermine distrust
12. When they leave
13. Why they reject sex without love
14. Love in its various forms
15. Dismantling ambiguity
16. Preserving the thin thread and moving forward
17. Additional clarifications
Conclusions

The criticisms in this book do not apply to sincere women.

Introduction

The Profane Feminine is the reverse of the wonderful Sacred Feminine, its opposite pole.

I did not intend to write any more about the animal side of human females, but the messages I have been receiving have shown the need to clarify a few more points. That is why this work is short.

I value the continuous construction of knowledge. The ideas contained here ARE NOT PERMANENT. They correspond to my present thinking and may be changed as experience requires. Understand this well and do not forget it!

I want to make clear that I do not judge women: it is they themselves who show and reveal themselves in the way I describe them. The existence of exceptions does not invalidate the outlining of a profile (among the various existing and/or possible ones). The exceptions are excluded from the profile pointed out here.

I make a point of stressing, once again, that these studies of the female gender are philosophical satires, at times tragicomic, and not sets of simple neurolinguistic techniques, nor misogynist dogmatisms, with which I have no sympathy whatsoever. I am not on the side of the lie but of the truth. I do not side with deception but with sincerity. My articles are not meant to manipulate but the opposite: to provide knowledge that makes possible self-defense against the feminine magnetism that operates in deceitful manipulations of the mind and of feeling. We study ways of dismantling female manipulations, not of manipulating women selfishly.

Do not confuse my philosophical essays with seduction manuals. These studies are concerned with living together and with winning a woman over with a view to stable relationships (therefore, between adults). They were published to be discussed and to stimulate critical development. THIS IS NOT A RECIPE BOOK! If you are looking for a body of doctrine to submit to or for someone to order you what to do, close this book and throw it away, because it was not written for you!

Once again I reiterate that I DO NOT ABSOLVE MAN OF THE BLAME THAT IS HIS; I simply do not concern myself with denouncing male wickedness in detail, for the sake of focus, since that is done every day, everywhere. Why throw one more stone when everyone is already throwing them?

In friendship,

Nessahan Alita

1. The danger of getting it all wrong

None of the observations, recommendations, suggestions, and reflections contained in my books should be taken dogmatically and uncritically. I do not write for ignoramuses looking for ready-made formulas and finished, closed conceptions. I only provide a provisional model for a better understanding of the contradictions we come up against in love.

The messages I have been receiving have shown that many readers did not understand the need to administer contrary attitudes in suitable doses and according to circumstances. On being told of the need to develop strength, confidence, and coldness, they fell into the mistake of polarizing themselves exclusively in distance and indifference, and obtained disastrous results.

The more sensitive ones, who had had bitter experiences, concluded that they should simply be the opposite of what they had been, and later complained about the lack of results, but they did not hold themselves responsible, as they should have.

The fact is that dealing with women is not as easy as the uninformed suppose. It is not enough to adopt the posture of the tough guy, one-sided, and leave it at that. Much more is needed: knowing how to reward good behavior, responding to sincerity, having firm protective attitudes, being flexible, alternating one's conduct, being able to accept, being adaptable, etc.

One point that caused confusion was that of rejection. We should not reject a woman when she comes to us and offers herself sincerely; instead we should seize the opportunity and reciprocate. We should reject her only when we notice signs of some trap, trick, or emotional knavery, as, for example, when they offer themselves in order to attract us and then scorn us or exchange us for someone else. As long as there are no such signs, we should accept the approach and make the most of it[1]. However, when we realize that the sly one wants to play the pursued one, we need to be quicker and reject her or give her a "dressing-down" first, robbing her of the feeling of triumph and "shocking" her.

[1] I understand that we should never be unjust or ungrateful toward women who offer us their sincerity without ulterior motives or who seek to understand us. The defensive, dismantling posture is justified only in cases of unmistakable attempts at emotional abuse.

What is advisable is not simply to push her away gratuitously, indiscriminately, and any old way, but only when we sense the smell of the irresponsible game, of the little game of attracting and repelling. In cases where the signs are explicitly favorable to an approach, the right thing is to seize the moment and draw closer, receiving them naturally, but without lowering one's guard completely.

At the root of the mistakes I am pointing out lie the belief that it would be enough to replace certain behavioral conditionings with others, and also the conviction that there are general rules that can be applied mechanically to every situation. There is no such thing. The female psyche is complex, and the behavioral and analytical parameters I provide are only guiding principles, effective only when dosed and adapted to the context. Therefore, those who do not know how to identify situations in which to apply them correctly will obtain results opposite to those expected. One and the same act can produce multiple effects depending on the situations or contexts. Those who believe a set of ready-made recipes is possible that will always work in every situation, regardless of the moment at which they are applied, are very far from understanding this science and would do better to abandon it. Dealing with women is not for the ignorant, the stupid, misogynists, and witless fools of little intelligence.

One of our fundamental mistakes consists in not accepting the cold, selfish, and indifferent nature of women toward us. We insist on not accepting reality and on nourishing the absurd hope that they might offer their love to those who ask for it. Against all evidence, we vehemently deny to ourselves the incontestable fact that female love is offered only to those who do not want it, or for as long as we do not want it. This refusal to surrender to reality is the cause of our torment.

It turns out, then, that the struggle is against ourselves, against the obsession of our absurd illusions, dreams, and hopes, and not against the opposite sex, as some who wrote to me believed. It is a waste of time to set oneself against women. Trying to force them to change their conduct is useless. Passion is our great enemy. The need to be loved by those we love is killing us[2].

[2] Because it is excessively intense in men. If it were something sober, it would do good, but the male need to be loved by women tends to be exaggerated in our Western culture, owing to ideological indoctrination begun in childhood and violently reinforced in adolescence. Women seem to me more balanced in this respect, and that is precisely why they dominate men, not always altruistically.

We have to work inwardly toward accepting reality, even if it is painful. Reality will not change; it will not submit to our desires. Human females will not stop being what they are and what they have been. So we have to eliminate our desire for them to be coherent, logical, and sensible[3] in love and sex.

Notice that women do not accept that we are human. This happens because they wish to give themselves to a "Beyond-Man." When they discover that the one beside them is human, suffers, and feels, they become furious instead of feeling compassion. Know that your emotional suffering will provoke irritation instead of pity. It is almost impossible for them to feel pity for the emotional suffering of the one who was supposed to be their man. That is why, if you ask to be loved, you are more likely to provoke revulsion than pity.

To love those who do not love us and to feel aversion for those who love us is illogical. However, the female unconscious follows its own principles, and ladies, as a rule, do not control it, do not confront it, and often do not even suspect that it exists[4]. So it is we who have to study them, observe them, understand them, comprehend them, and accept them, because they will hardly be able to do the same with us. But this understanding will not be possible as long as we are maddened by passion.

When we are in love, we want females to love us, to be with us all the time, as in a continuous sexual union. This continuous demand for contact causes aversion. The worst of it is that they themselves are the ones who ask us for and demand our being in love, but when we give it to them, they reject us and start avoiding us.

Every time a man tries to live a "great love"[5], a terrible misfortune befalls him. Passionate love is very close to hatred because it is irrational, instinctive, and animal. That is why the two forms of passion tend to follow each other.[6]

There is, therefore, no alternative other than to dissolve in our hearts all the shadows

---

[3] From the male point of view.

[4] When a person, whether woman or man, admits to having a dark side, he or she begins to observe it and understand it, transcending it and becoming happier.

[5] I am referring to romantic-passionate love, which is insane and is nothing but a sentimental disguise for raw animal instinct, and not to true altruistic love.

[6] Here is one of the many reasons why I do not write for those who give themselves over to negative feelings. Hatred and resentment worsen a man's situation; they make him ill.

of attachment, passion, and sentimentalism[7].

If you are suffering over some sly one, you could die and you would not arouse any pity. You will be seen as a weak man, useless, good-for-nothing, incapable of taking care of himself, a rag, a dog, a rat. So do not waste time suffering over any "tramp"[8]. Love yourself and do not dream of ridiculous hypocritical romances. The danger and falseness of rose-colored loves exist in direct proportion to their beauty and fascination. Learn to resist what is lovely, wonderful, and fascinating.

First of all, let us remember that we will die and be forgotten. Therefore, let us seek happiness within the soul and not outside it. Let us give ourselves over to our Spirit. Only He will be with us after death.

Your partner will be less cold if she believes you are "the man," "the one," "the real deal," but she will never love you as you would like, that is, simply for what you are: a human being who suffers and feels. Above all, she will not feel tenderness for you. However, if she is treated as a mere female, she will feel attraction. She will complain endlessly, but the interesting results will make themselves felt.

Do not simply treat her with coldness and indifference: be her mirror most of the time. Tell her you love her only when she says it, give presents when you receive them, but be distant when she is cold. Return what you receive in the same way. If you receive affection, return it (not too much). If you receive coldness, return it with coldness. If she avoids you, unmask her and avoid her. If she complains about all this, throw it back in her face. This requires freedom from passion and behavioral deconditioning. Pay her back in the same coin and, at times, even more intensely than you received. Train her[9]. Nevertheless, have your point of support in masculinity: be more "fearsome" than lovable, colder than affectionate, more "cruel" than merciful, more distant than close. Even so, be mysterious, protective, and a leader. Obviously, never fail to wear her out with intense sex.

---

[7] This will not turn us into monsters but, on the contrary, will allow sublime and higher inner states to blossom. I insist so much on the dissolution of sentimentalism because it is dangerous, given its immense magnetic and hypnotic power to seduce and deceive by passing itself off as something sublime and spiritual.

[8] By "tramp," understand an idle shrew who spends her time playing with what is most serious to a man: his sincere feelings. Not all women, however, do this. I have known women who, because they deal very well with their dark side instead of denying it, do not play nasty jokes with male love.

[9] Isn't this what Karen Salmansohn and Amy Sutherland suggest all the time, which is why they are applauded?

Let us now look at some intentional and malicious distortions. Certain idiots, male and female, have said that my writings encourage male promiscuity. That is a lie. What I do is denounce the female preference for promiscuous men. In truth, I am against promiscuity and sexual degeneration. If at some point I wrote that women set up socio-psychic structures that corner men and push them into promiscuity, I did so as a denunciation, so that the wile might be shattered. Moreover, the man who knows the female psyche and is able to bind to himself a woman he considers interesting and with whom he has great affinity will be much more satisfied and will tend less toward promiscuity and changing partners.

According to other imbeciles, I supposedly attack women, and this would therefore be evidence that we, the students of male love crises and of female wiles, do not appreciate them, or sex either. Here is another slanderous piece of knavery. What we teach is precisely how to defeat them in the war of passion so as to obtain what is refused: certainties, definitions, clarity, and transparency in love and sex. Obviously, nobody would look for such elements in romantic relationships if he did not like the best that women have to offer. However, when we identify with these three attractions and begin to pursue them passionately like madmen, we lose them. So, to have them, one must first not desire them.

Some lunatics judge that I am simply a rebel trying to defame women, and they do so because this is the conclusion most accessible to their deteriorated brains. The short imagination they possess does not allow them to conclude that there may be lofty motives for someone who unveils bad intentions and tricks in love. In the case of this ridiculous accusation that I am unmasking now, what logical dissection reveals is, besides plain and simple stupidity, a naive attempt at defensive manipulation against truths whose revelation and demonstration are uncomfortable. The underlying idea these manipulators work with is that males could not criticize female postures, nor become indignant or defend themselves against psychological wiles that destroy sincerity in relationships. In short, they argue, fallaciously, that we should remain passive in the face of female tricks because such passivity would be, in their view, proof that we like females.[10] They want to induce the following belief in the unwary: that it is impossible to find defects in something delicious. They suggest that when we like something, we do not criticize it, and when we do not like something, we criticize it; in other words, they defend irrationality. They hide the fact that delicious females have developed sophisticated wiles to cheat us and not to hand over their treasures to us (sex, affection, and love). In truth, what happens is exactly the opposite of what these idiots preach: it is females who are indifferent and do not much like men, while we, the males, desire, want, and love them desperately. We only need to look around us a little and we will soon see women belittling men, saying that men are good for nothing and that they do not need them. The opposite never happens and never has. No one has ever heard of men who wanted to build a society without women or to banish them from the Earth, but that is exactly the discourse of many women, including feminists. We know very well that we cannot live without females, and we acknowledge that fact[11], while they generally adopt the opposite posture.

[10] Every person, whether man or woman, has the right to defend himself or herself against cheating in love, but has no right to cheat.

There are also the resentful misogynists, who cannot bear to read any book without falling even more deeply into their negative and sick emotional states. Now, if they are sick, why do they seek out philosophy? They should cure themselves first. This category of ailing men believes that every book that falls into their hands is support for their absurd view of the world. Hallucinating, they see in the sentences only confirmations of their fanciful ideas.

Nor can I forget to mention a category of jackasses (and she-mules) who reacted with the ridiculous assertion or assumption that we defend violent extremist machismo and the oppression of women[12]. Such ignoramuses show that they do not even know how to read properly, for if they did, they would have realized that the object of our criticisms is precisely the female behaviors developed over the course of history as a manipulative adaptation, defensive and/or offensive, to extremist and unenlightened machismo. Such behavioral adaptations, conscious and unconscious, work against the goal of those who supposedly wish the good of the "weaker sex," because they block the development of women as human beings. Does anyone by chance believe that by manipulating, deceiving, and acting childishly in love anyone could arrive at happiness? Or does the preference for the worst men benefit them in some respect? The fact is that people with cockroach brains react to their reading on a merely passionate and emotional level, believing the absurdity that we benefit someone when we exempt that person from criticism. They

[11] A world without the feminine would be a nightmare for us men. The feminine is what we lack. The point criticized here is the abusive and malicious advantage that certain women take of this weakness and emotional need. The positive characteristics of woman calm us and provide an unmistakable sense of well-being, even reducing stress. Their absence causes violent withdrawal syndromes.

[12] Some of these detractors are misogynists and others are misandrists/androphobes.

cunningly imply that women should not be criticized for their knavery and tricks. They work with the underlying idea that criticism harms and never benefits. They hide the fact that behavior adapted to retrograde extremist machismo has halted the evolution of women, harming them by turning them, with few exceptions, into superficial, frivolous, lying, passionate, irrational, manipulative, masochistic creatures, etc. They also hide the unconscious machismo rooted in the female psyche, which leads women continually to ask to be dominated, subjugated, and led, to judge males by their hierarchical position, to grow bored with kind democratic husbands, to prefer oppressors and rich men, etc. I do defend an enlightened, tolerant, and conscious machismo. We could not go against machismo in itself, because we would be going against ourselves. The word "machismo" comes from the word macho (male) and does not intrinsically imply oppression, exploitation, or violence, as dogmatic feminists purposely try to make it appear in order to confuse people and induce them to conclude that males are bad, violent, oppressive, and dangerous by nature.

The three accusations above are sophistical. What are sophisms? They are arguments purposely intended to deceive the unwary by manipulating ideas so as to hide their logical flaws. Sophisms are the main weapon of charlatans, scoundrels, and manipulators who stand on the side of the lie and of the exploitation of others by inducing beliefs and feelings. We must dissect them and expose all their fallacious procedures to the disinfecting light of consciousness. Unfortunately, they will come back and go on troubling the lives of sincere people, for, it seems to me, dishonest behavior in analysis is archetypal. It has survived since ancient Greece, and today it is more active than ever.

2. Why they don’t look at you

It bothers us to notice that we are continually looking at them in the streets, desiring them insanely, while they could not care less about us; they ignore us. Why does this happen?

The answer is that nature made females indifferent to males and made males desperate for females. Female sexual desire is much less intense than male desire.

Note that a human female can be impregnated by only one male in the space of a year. By contrast, how many females could that male impregnate in the same period?

If you go on a sex strike, you will see that your companion will be affected only after a few weeks. And even then it will not be from the lack of sex itself, but from the disturbance of doubt about what is going on.

Those who present themselves as fatal females are in fact pretending. Even nymphomaniacs, prostitutes, and porn actresses are not moved by simple genital desire, as the uninformed suppose. They are driven to the act by other motives: money, acceptance, damaged self-esteem, competition, curiosity, etc. They grow used to sexual hyperactivity and accept it, taking it on as in a stage play. Know that women do not much like sex itself, and they deceive you. There are anorgasmic women who are extremely promiscuous.

Many are those who pride themselves on their anorgasmia. Many are those who state in so many words that they do not need males for anything. Cases of women who rape men practically do not exist, and one does not hear of women who sexually harass their sons or brothers. We do not see women groping our virile member without our permission when we are on buses or in the streets. I have never heard of a single woman who spied on a man in the shower. There are no proven cases of women who make war on other peoples in order to take their males. The reverse, however, has been well known since time immemorial. These facts prove, in an absolutely irrefutable way, that the female sexual appetite is a sham. In truth, a woman’s sexual appetite is weak, which gives her immense endurance in the act of copulation by minimizing energy loss. Even so, the belief persists that women desire sex as much as we do. Why? Simply because their desires and feelings of various kinds take on a sexual appearance and express themselves that way, confusing us. What is expressed under the appearance of sexual desire is, in truth, fear, greed, envy, competitiveness, sadness, revenge, gratitude, pride, etc. If it were not so, females would be after us all the time, they would pursue us, and the situation would be reversed.

If someone still goes on doubting this evident truth, we unmask and destroy the lie that has victimized him with one more observation: prostitutes and porn actresses will not offer their favors unless they are paid; the most coveted hotties of the schools, the dance clubs, the dances, and the street corners do not offer themselves to shy, needy, dull, penniless males, but to playboys. Is there any objection left?

I will, even so, stamp on and grind them a little more until the remains of these lies disappear completely. In a survey published by Marie Claire magazine this month (July 2006), 74% of the women interviewed said they would rather go shopping at a mall than have an orgasm. I do not believe the editor faked the survey... Those who must have faked it were the interviewees themselves. Liars that they are, my first suspicion is that the remaining 24% also preferred shopping and did not tell the truth!

The climax of rose-colored romances is dull kisses on the mouth, not wildly passionate sex.

People are reluctant to admit that coitus in and of itself is of little interest to females, because the idea is unpleasant to both sexes. Feminists then take the opportunity to say that we repress and castrate female sexuality, for the hypothesis that they are inherently apathetic and cold displeases them greatly.

But, our naive opponents will say, then why do they howl and hallucinate during the sexual act, even to the point of losing their sensitivity to pain? The answer is this: because they are melodramatic and theatrical, and possess the rare ability to believe in their own simulations and pretenses without losing awareness that they are pretending. They achieve this feat by dividing themselves into two parts: one that believes in the pretense and another that preserves the knowledge of the pretense. Excitement that appears exclusively sexual is, in truth, much more emotional and passionate in nature than properly erotic. It is adrenaline raised by an economic, sentimental, and social context without which sex will not happen. The fatal female is a sham.

My opponents will then say that this is due to the sexual repression exercised by men over women. What a fallacy! Such repression does not exist or, if it does, it is exercised mainly by fathers and husbands, with the specific interest of concentrating female libido on a single man, and it does not cancel out the attempts at stimulation on the part of most other human males. Let us do a test: let us leave a woman in the middle of several men, preferably half-undressed or in provocative clothing, and see whether they try to repress her or to encourage her sexually... In truth, human males try more to stimulate than to repress female sexuality, for they think about mating full-time.

We have to understand, once and for all, that the desire to receive sex and affection is NOT the main weakness of the female sex. The main weaknesses are others:

- Fear, which moves them to seek men who offer protection, guidance, and leadership;
- Greed, which moves them to seek males who have material possessions and wealth;
- Curiosity, which moves them to try to seduce disconcerting, intriguing, and mysterious men;
- Envy, which moves them to try to take men away from beautiful women or men who are desired by many;
- Pride, which moves them to try to seduce in order to prove to themselves that they are attractive;
- Revenge, which moves them to try to seduce and subjugate a man who has wounded their self-esteem and pride.

The motives that lead a woman to come on to a man can be various: to enslave him through love (so that he works or supplies money without getting anything in return), to make her rivals envious, to take revenge, to discover what is hidden behind his intriguing behavior, to be protected against threats of all kinds, to prove to herself that she has the power to attract the opposite sex, to test her own power of seduction, to obtain a substitute for the vanished biological father of the child she is carrying in her womb, to check whether men consider her ugly and uninteresting, etc. Never will the advances made by a human female be due to an exclusively sexual desire or to a disinterested love, as everyone wants it to appear.

Therefore, they do not like sex as much as they seem to, and they do not notice our presence in the streets simply because they do not have the act of copulation as an existential goal, they do not miss us, and, to make everything worse, they believe themselves continually desired by everyone[13]. We, on the contrary, live only to have sex and are desperate to have them in our arms, to invade them, penetrate them, and lose ourselves inside them.

Males dream of females who fall in love with their phalus erectus and pursue it tirelessly, but such a dream is absurd and crazy. For a woman to look at a stranger and come on to him, other motivations of a nonsexual nature are needed. It is a waste of time to spend energy on such foolish hopes. No woman dreams of a four-meter penis, but many lie and say they do.

You will never be pursued by women for exclusively sexual reasons, but for other reasons disguised as sexual ones, such as money, prominence, protection, security, the need to have a chump at their service, self-affirmation, etc. They do not want you simply for sex, even if they say so, but only to use you in other ways. That is how female passion works, and it is selfish and self-interested.

Women will go on not noticing your presence, they will ignore you, and they will not come out of their inertia unless you display some visible symbol of power that shows social superiority over rival males.

They will not look at you for nothing. For your utopian dream of being chased by gorgeous females to be satisfied, you would have to have the attributes of the males they chase, and that is the problem: gorgeous females are monopolized merchandise and chase only the powerful, the famous, and the mobsters. They chase only those who stand out at the top of the male hierarchy. So, if you want to have or keep a beauty in your arms, take the initiative and do not stand waiting passively. Get moving, do something. However, do not forget that you will have to act by alternative routes.

You, I, or any other ordinary male will be the object of a spontaneous glance only from those who feel incapable of attracting males more socially prominent than we are.

[13] It is worth stressing, regarding this detail, that believing themselves desired satisfies the female compulsion for the eternal preservation of male interest. When they feel desired, there is no discomfort of any kind and, therefore, no need whatsoever to take action. Men keep women in inertia by treating them like queens, goddesses, and offering themselves as slaves.

Elements that easily draw the female gaze of admiration are: big flashy cars, a display of luxury, and expensive clothes (not for the beauty they possess in themselves but because they are signs of power). We ordinary men, however, have to resort to other means: the fearsome gaze, selective indifference, calculated horrification, intriguing conduct, masculine posture, distinctive speech, a commanding tone of voice, a protective, distant, and non-insistent attitude, mysterious behavior, etc.

3. The privileges

It is commonly said that females are poor victims of society, that they have been exploited and oppressed in every culture since prehistory and only in the twentieth century achieved emancipation, that men are their enemies, etc. Let us unmask this untruth as well.

All those studies claiming that women have always been poor victims of males are exclusionary and biased. Exclusionary because they do not take into account the privileges that have benefited women in the various eras. Biased because they do so on purpose. If we study the different societies, we will see that, in truth, what happens is exactly the opposite, as Van Creveld denounces. Men have always been assigned the worst, most difficult, heaviest, and most dangerous work. In situations of danger, as in natural catastrophes, males have the duty to protect women and children, and are therefore the last to gain access to safety and to the guarantees of life. Obviously, these rights of women and children are not wrong; they are sacred. What is wrong is to lie by saying that we oppress and exploit them when, in truth, we were born to protect them. If we ceased to exist, as some feminists would like, who would go into the fire to rescue the victims of blazes? Who would do the dangerous work on high towers and on the tops of buildings? Who would face the currents to rescue flood victims? Who would go into the underground sewers to unclog them? Who would carry the sacks of cement and other heavy loads? Who would unload the trucks? Who would slaughter the cattle so that the meat could go to the butcher shop?

We flatter and fawn over females in the hope of receiving crumbs of sex. The opposite has never happened. We compete fiercely among ourselves for them. Mobsters, celebrities, and the powerful do not want fame, money, and power just so they can sit and contemplate them... In the competition among males, which is socioeconomic, the winners get the most desirable women, the beautiful and perfect ones, while the losers content themselves with those the former turned down.

All of this privileges females and not us. We do not see them killing themselves for a place in the shade of our protection. After we have slaughtered one another, they simply wait and settle into the places hierarchically reserved for them beside those who are left.

Females manage to make certain privileges that they themselves provoke and incessantly seek look like sad sufferings so that, on the basis of this forged appearance, they can claim more privileges. E.g.: male polygamy (they themselves are the ones attracted to men who have many girlfriends), motherhood, staying at home and being supported by a rich man, etc.

Privileges make them snobbish and sure of being desired. That is why they feel free to abuse male feelings. Besides, they believe themselves continually pursued and harassed. You need only stop and stare at one of these privileged beings and you will immediately be seen as a harasser or a flirt. And if you are poor, black, or of mixed race, it will be even worse. They never imagine that we might be finding them uninteresting. That is why we surprise and disconcert them when we ignore, avoid, and reject them.

4. Mothers, wives, and daughters

When dealing with their male children, many mothers talk as if they were mentally handicapped: they swap their R's for L's, call everything by a diminutive, and use a specific high-pitched tone of voice[14]. Besides that, instead of toy tigers, sharks, crocodiles, dragons, and swords, they give them little animals, teddy bears, little ducks, etc., so that they will not grow up.

As the poor things grow up, their dependence on female affection grows with them. When they become physically adult, they are incapable of living without female affection and the presence of mommy or a substitute. When they fall in love, they transfer the maternal imago to their girlfriend or wife. The transference carries with it the expectations, obligations, and demands. The wretch expects from women what he was used to expecting from his mother: love. The man in love pleases, obeys, gives presents, and flatters, hoping to receive affection in return, because that worked when he was little. But the result now is disastrous. Females react in the opposite way from what he expects and disconcert him.

Sly ones that they are, women take advantage of this neediness. Far from feeling compassion for the emotional state of males, they use it as a tool to defend themselves and dominate them.

To complete the job, the sly ones proclaim to the four winds that the chosen ones will be the sensitive, affectionate, romantic, kind, honest, sincere, and hardworking men. It is as if they were saying: "If you are good boys, we will give you love and sex the way you want them." It is all nothing but a lie. Experience and direct observation reveal the opposite.

Faced with a beautiful woman, men submit and do everything they are told, resembling dogs and beasts of burden. They give the maximum and receive the minimum. They expect to be rewarded with top-quality sex and affection, but they are frustrated.

Men in love, when they marry their goddesses, are exploited, deceived, and betrayed. However, the thing began long before...

---

[14] In the first months of life, this conduct may even be indispensable as a good way of establishing emotional affinity with the child. But when it becomes a habit and stretches over several years, it becomes an obstacle that delays the development of masculinity. This is my opinion.

Females learn to dissemble, deceive, hoodwink, and double-cross from the day they are born. They are protected and taught by their mothers, even if the mothers do not realize it. They practice the art of knavery first on their poor father: lying, getting around his orders and rules, dating in secret, etc. Once they are well trained, the skill will be used with boyfriends and later with husbands. The dynamic is always the same: to enjoy the pleasant aspects of life and to shift the side effects and unpleasant consequences onto someone else. Daughters want to do freely whatever they feel like without ceasing to have their expenses paid by their father. For dating or for promiscuous "hooking up," girls demand to be treated as adults, but when it comes to paying expenses and the obligations of supporting themselves, they demand to be treated as children. Adult women want to live "freely," exempt from marital obligations, but without losing the rights of a wife/girlfriend/fiancée. The chumps must hold the bag so that the clever girls can have their fun.

As long as they do not know how to give back the consequences of other people's attitudes, the wretched males will suffer a great deal at the hands of the sly ones.

He who does not transcend the conception of woman that originates in the maternal relationship will fall victim to infatuation. Inherent in attributing a maternal meaning to the animal female is attributing a sacred meaning to her, which constitutes a profanation. And one does not cast pearls before swine with impunity.

5. Why they are the opposite of what they confess

The unconscious stands in a relationship of opposition and complement to the conscious psyche. This is one of the reasons why people do not practice what they preach.

We do not know a person just by listening to what she says; we have to observe her to verify how she acts and reacts in various situations. Besides that, there are also conscious and purposeful inconsistencies. Human beings, including the females of the species, are feigning, false, lying, deceiving, and hypocritical.

It is common for women to badmouth a man they feel attracted to. Almost all of them are unanimous in condemning the attitudes of cads and playboys, swearing up and down that they could never desire them, but when they are in front of them, they swoon and give themselves. All of them guarantee that they desire good, hardworking, honest men, but when they are in front of them, they find them tiresome and boring.

It follows that he who tries to be guided by what the sly ones say will be caught by surprise and come off badly. In the same way, almost all those interviews and polls that claim to demystify the disconcerting female imagination are ridiculous and false; they only muddle and disconcert our understanding.

Be very careful when you hear them saying: "I like men who are like this and like that, who do this or that." They will very probably be lying, for in the field of love and sex they tend to be the opposite of what they confess.

Do not try to fit the confessed ideal male model. Notice that they decide in favor of the absurd. Those who "bend" them are precisely the opposite of what is announced.

Do not waste time questioning them about what they want: observe them and you will find out. If you ask, you will be deceived. It is not rare for them to ask for precisely what will be rejected when it is received. They tend to repay affection with indifference and protective dominance with affection.

Understanding the female psyche is fundamental for dealing correctly with these delicious sirens. However, true understanding comes from observation and not from conversations.

In schools and high schools, we commonly see them scorn the good, polite, studious boys. They band together to admire and competitively chase the rowdiest and most undisciplined ones, who prefer drinking, getting hooked on drugs, having irresponsible fun, and avoiding study. Even so, when questioned, they deny, against all evidence, that they prefer the worst. But impartial observation reveals that the selection criteria are the style of the clothes, the motorcycles, the cars and, depending on age, the size of the salary, of the bank account, and of the material possessions. In short: social prominence is all that matters.

The preference for the worst makes them naive and means they can easily be fooled by anyone. I know young men who rent motorcycles and cars to show them off at the doors of schools, bars, or dance clubs as if they were their own. They also often pay beautiful prostitutes to accompany them as if they were their girlfriends. The result is not long in coming, and several foolish women are quickly taken to a motel. Hardly rational, these females cannot resist the fascination of false signs of power that are convincing. Afterward, when they are abandoned after losing their virginity, they go around complaining and cursing every male on Earth, as if they themselves were not responsible for having offered themselves to precisely those they should not have. And they go on lying without the slightest shame when they say they feel attracted to nice, honest guys.

As I read the other day, I don't remember where: women do not like the romantic dinner, as they say, but rather the high price of the whiskey, the diamond in the ring they are given, and the gold of the jewelry... They use love to camouflage their shameful greed.

Despite the lies that all of them insist on naively trying to keep up, the truth is that a female's attraction is determined by the social value of the male. If he is considered "the hunk" or "the top dog" by the social circle and circle of friends in which she lives, he will arouse attraction even if he is mediocre, stupid, infantile, and promiscuous, as we see in the film "Kids." He can have several girlfriends at the same time, for all of them will find his promiscuity lovely and will consider it a legitimate right. So what, under such conditions, they dare to call love is garbage, a ridiculous sentimentalism activated by social prominence.

Most males are not able to seduce beautiful women simply because they believe that these women are what they openly confess. Falling for these lying con games, they act according to what they were induced to believe and obtain results opposite to those they aimed for. Meanwhile, the worst good-for-nothings have no qualms about lying and pretending to impress them and fool them without the slightest scruple, and they are rewarded with good-quality sex and affection. This is repeated incessantly everywhere and, even so, they never change. Irrational female passionality colludes with lies, with vice, and with pretense, rewarding mediocrity and contributing to social degeneration[15].

Try to see them as robots with intense but conditioned feelings[16]. The female posture is a reflection of the male one[17]. Change your behavior and they will change. Give them what they need and not what they ask for or claim to desire.

Try being protective, guiding, and caring on the one hand, and at the same time mysterious, distant, commanding, and cold on the other. You will see for yourself that they lie when they swear they prefer men who are in love, affectionate, mushy, tender, and needy.

The opposition between what they say and what they actually feel lies at the origin of the many confusions that disconcert the male sex. Let us look at some examples.

Women say they like romantic men. This is partly true. They really do like romantic, lovestruck men as slaves, but they feel no sexual attraction to them at all. They say they detest and do not accept male infidelity. This is another partial truth. The infidelity of the emotional slave is indeed not accepted, but, curiously, the infidelity of the inaccessible ones (the powerful, the famous, and, in general, all the socially prominent) is not only accepted but also works as an attraction. The number of women of those who "are most in the spotlight" is, unfortunately, something that makes such a man interesting. They state in no uncertain terms that they do not want to be dominated, but when they date a democratic man, they feel bored and consider him a "wimp," passive and weak, because the poor guy does not trample on their opinions. We thus confirm that almost everything we hear them say about themselves is a lie.

---

[15] Just as irrational male passionality colludes with degenerative promiscuous fornication. All passionality is irrational, and that is why we cannot give ourselves over to it. Passionality is the cause of the wars that destroy peoples, of the consumerism that destroys the planet, and of the folly that destroys couples and families.

[16] The human being is a humanoid robot who lives in the incoherence of the automatism of his illusions. Men are also robots, but here we are concerned with the automatism of women.

[17] Just as the male posture is a reflection of the female one. I propose overcoming this automatism.

Observe and you will confirm that most of the promises they make in love are not kept: they promise to call and do not call, they promise to show up for dates and do not come, they promise paradise in sex and refuse it when the moment arrives, they promise fidelity and flirt with other guys, they promise understanding and call you “insecure” when you want clarification about suspicious conduct. They are dishonest in love and keep their promises only when they fear the consequences of their cheating. Therefore, when you receive a promise, do not believe it will be kept spontaneously, and set a fair “punishment”[18] to match the fraud, informing her of it. If you do not do this, she will have fun deceiving you.

Do not let yourself be swept away by the charm of the sirens’ voices with their deceitful talk. If you waste time running after the nonsense they talk, they will refuse you the smile full of life, the passionate look, the ardent kiss, the warm embrace, and the maddening sex. They will try to screw you over in the end, because the logic that guides them is that of absolute sentimental selfishness. That is why it is lawful and fair for you to “arm” yourself and defend yourself. Always stay on the side of truth and reason. Do not play dirty; leave that task to them.

[18] I am referring to giving back the consequences of the cheating act, not to revenge.

6. The capricious judgments

Female opinions, where romantic relationships are concerned, are often capricious, reckless, and lacking in logical-rational sense, which harms them and makes them childish.

Try questioning them about the reasons for their incoherent conclusions and conduct. The answers will be illogical, confused, subjective, and long (from our point of view, the male one, but not from theirs). In truth, they do not really know why they choose complicated paths. The correct answer is this: because they draw their conclusions from feeling. For women, what is right is whatever provokes pleasant feelings, and what is wrong is whatever displeases them emotionally. They are emotionally oriented beings. This does not mean that they are innocent and loving, as everyone thinks. They are in truth very selfish, just as we are, but their selfishness is sentimental in content and, more specifically, romantic.

Because they judge by emotion, they develop capricious and absurd opinions, such as, for example, that the worst males are the best and should be chased. None of them can properly explain why she does it. If we corner one of them in an argument, they will defend themselves by trying to provoke the most varied feelings in us: anger, pity, shame, doubt, confusion, desire, fear, etc. They will use a loud tone of voice to try to intimidate us, they will shout, they will cackle like witches to provoke feelings of smallness and ridicule, then they will cry so that we feel pity, then they will resort to cynical and provocative terms... These are wiles meant to manipulate our emotions, and they never change. Emotion is the terrain on which they rule and move with ease.

Worthy of note is a very common tendency that can be seen in heated sexist arguments between people of the opposite sex, especially in cases where they are not in a romantic relationship with each other. This tendency becomes visible when we openly criticize female wiles, and it consists in attacking our masculinity by cynically calling us homosexuals. This is done in the moments of greatest desperation, when all other attempts at emotional manipulation have failed. Such attacks usually work: they disconcert and confuse the straight male, inducing him to worry about his own image and to try to prove that he is not what the sly one is pretending to think. While he chases after this nonsense, the argument is set aside. I have resolved these interesting cases simply by unmasking them and saying that women who challenge the masculinity of a heterosexual man are, in truth, challenging him to the sexual act, asking for sex. It usually works very well. Even so, the ideal is never to argue.

When I state that female opinions are capricious, irrational, and irresponsible, many women become furious, but they should thank me, for I am denouncing something that harms them. If they made an effort to be a little more rational, without losing their superior emotionality and delicacy, they would be less reckless, less frivolous, less incoherent, they would not be so terrified of the truth, and they would live better, for they would be less prone to hysterical and depressive crises. Unfortunately, our little friends do not realize that the immense void of sadness and boredom in which they live is directly linked to the dirty games they play in love. Believing themselves very clever, they mistakenly suppose that deception is the road to happiness.

The experimentally verifiable sexual preference for those who do not love them and for promiscuous men is irrefutable proof that their conclusions are capricious and of purely subjective motivation. Add to this that such preferences are rewards for mediocrity and contribute to social degeneration.

Stubborn and capricious opinions change only when the impact of their own mistakes strikes them in their feelings, causing suffering. Unfortunately, impacts are consequences and, therefore, are felt only a posteriori, when it is usually too late. That is why it is no use to alert, warn, caution, quarrel, etc., and still less to argue or debate.

7. The value of silence

A powerful counter-manipulative and even coercive[19] weapon is silence.

Like coldness, silence cannot be used indiscriminately. If you think that simply staying mute will solve everything, you are wrong. You should use silence for long periods only when you have been the victim of some emotional crookedness. The rest of the time, you should soften it with well-chosen words. But you should never be very talkative.

Simply keeping quiet will not solve anything. You should keep quiet under certain conditions and soften the silence under other conditions. Few manage to discern this; most naively believe in the effectiveness of generalizable, mechanically polarized behaviors.

Very few men are able to remain silent through long periods of conflict. Usually we try to keep quiet after suffering injustices, subtle betrayals, or having our feelings turned into the object of irresponsible games, but we cannot bear to do so for long. When we reach the limit of our capacity to endure, we explode and take out everything that has built up.

The urge to say what we feel is something that swallows us alive and eats away at us. It is aggravated by the difficulty of putting into words what we perceive. The difficulty is due to the infernal and confused chaos of ideas and emotions that mingle in an insane pandemonium purposely provoked by the sly ones, who stay aware of everything that is going on while at the same time refusing us certainties, definitions, and clarity in order to keep us in confusion. We have a great many dissatisfactions but, however much we try to define and demonstrate them, we never feel that it is enough.

This obsession comes from mental hyperactivity. If you fall silent outwardly but inwardly go on with an agitated mind, thinking thousands of foolish things, you will end up in the madhouse. Silence is powerful and defeats them, but it needs to come from the inside out and never from the outside in. In her presence, keep your mind quiet. From the moment you do not think, there will be no confusion or doubt, for there will be no reasoning about it. The tormenting provocations will have no effect. Disconcerting female conduct affects only those who waste their precious time thinking about it, in the foolish attempt to put together the deliberate puzzles.

[19] Note that, although I am informing the reader about the coercive potential of silence, I am not recommending that it be used in this way. What I do recommend is that silence be used only in just contexts, as a means of dismantling manipulations and cheating.

If you try to fall silent from the outside in, you will develop psychosomatic illnesses and die. Only those who submit to inner spiritual discipline can attain true silence.

When you are the victim of some female crookedness, try suddenly becoming mute for a long time. She will return the silence and the distance, but there will come a moment when she cannot bear the torment and will try to get something out of you. That is the moment when you must say nothing and stay quiet. I am referring to a prolonged silence, not one of a few hours. This is very difficult. It requires complete freedom from passion, total willingness to lose, detachment, iron discipline, and a will of steel.

Since they are compulsive chatterboxes, we beat them in the field of silence with a certain ease if we are disciplined. However, I say again, we must fall silent from the inside out.

Silence makes them desperate because it does not allow them to know what is going on and what is going to happen. After reaching the limit of her endurance, she will try to force you to argue, debate, and fight[20]. Hold out until you wear her out. Then the moment will have come to state your point of view and your demand in a short, direct, and blunt way, withdrawing from the conversation before the argument starts.

Females keep for themselves discernment, certainty, and a clear definition of what is going on in the relationship, but at the same time they refuse them to the man to keep him trapped in confusion and doubt. Through contradictory attitudes, they hide the truth about what they feel, do, and plan, especially where fidelity is concerned. The undefined and incoherent posture is a weapon that disconcerts and immobilizes the other. Through silence, however, we hand this unwanted burden back to them. Silence torments them because it creates a situation in which nothing is defined. During silence, there is no certainty and everything is undefined. Silence preserves mystery and does not allow our intentions and feelings to be visible.

Maintaining silence is difficult because we live in a mental culture in which thoughts are encouraged and seen as necessary. The belief that one must think and rack one's brains reasoning in order to solve life's problems is very strong. The result is that we talk nonstop because our minds are hyperactive.

[20] Daniel Goleman states that the silence of a man who does not argue increases a woman's emotional stress.

Silence should be broken with guiding, protective, and slightly affectionate words when she behaves in an honest, transparent, and sincere way (which usually happens very rarely). There are, however, situations in which silence is useless and even gets in the way. They are situations that demand the powerful emotional impact of a well-chosen word.

8. The duplicity of feelings

Once in love, you will become dependent on the presence of your beloved and will pursue her incessantly so that your emotional pain may be relieved. Then the sly one will purposely and consciously set up a barrier to contact and keep you at a distance, suffering for love. The distance, the insurmountability of the barrier, the infatuation, and the pursuit stand in a directly proportional relationship to one another. The more in love you are, the more of a pursuer you will become. The more of a pursuer you are, the more insurmountable the barrier will be, the greater the distance, and the longer her absence will last.

It is a curious phenomenon: the sly one induces you to approach but then blocks the approach. By demanding the surrender of your heart, the sly one is inducing you to pursuit and courtship, for there is no passionate sentimentalism without a demand for the presence and nearness of the beloved object. Contradictory and illogical? No, just cold and calculating. What is the logic or meaning of such apparently contradictory behavior? To keep you emotionally enslaved, imprisoned by passion forever, loving her for all eternity, without being loved back and without receiving anything in return. Unconscious? No, purposeful and calculated. What is the motivation? Absolute sentimental selfishness. How is this possible? By the simple fact that we desire them desperately while they are almost indifferent to us.

How do we reverse it? By fighting against ourselves and acquiring characteristics that attract them. What are these characteristics? I have already described them exhaustively in my books.

Contradictory female conduct generates feelings of a contrary nature that do battle within us and tear our soul to pieces.

At the beginning of the relationship, when everything is a feigned bed of roses, feelings of attachment and the like are triggered and reinforced through the affectionate, caring, and loving conduct of one’s companion. In this phase, the woman behaves like a saint, ignores other males, etc. Later, when she has confirmed that we are well hooked and in love, our degree of dependence and emotional bond begins to be tested with provocative and challenging attitudes. It is in this stage that we experience many conflicts, most of them arising from conduct that subtly calls fidelity into question.

Until we have taken the bait, the female pretends to be exactly what we desire. She acts like the lady of our loveliest dreams, perfect, wonderful, and divine. After we take the bait, however, her conduct changes little by little, and from paradise we fall into hell.

"Innocent" attitudes of attention, friendliness, closeness, and care toward other males irritate a man because they shake his conviction in the loyalty of his companion's feelings. They are used on purpose as a form of provocation. The problem does not lie in the partner's promiscuous conduct, as feminists try to make it appear, but in the lack of transparency, in the indefiniteness, in the confusion and doubt that the conduct arouses. If the conduct were clear and defined from the start, as in the case of the prostitute, there would be no problem. But since we are rational, the irritation of doubt, as Peirce says, eats away at us, causing great emotional suffering. We need defined situations. A relationship stuffed with question marks and poorly explained facts causes great torment, for we are left solely at the mercy of trust. Since irrational belief without a logical basis is not our strong point, we feel the ground give way beneath us. What enrages us are contradictory postures. Subtle conduct, apparently of no seriousness at all, is perceived by us as violent acts of disguised betrayal. The innocence is only apparent, for it is precisely subtle conduct without malice that begins betrayals. Knowing this, the sly ones do precisely what we detest, and they do it consciously and with premeditation.

Provocations do not happen only in the field of fidelity. There are also attitudes that challenge and affront our feelings and values in many other fields.

Since we are territorial and want to protect our genes, we need to confirm continually through direct observation that our companion is absolutely faithful to us and keeps other males at a prudent distance. That is why, when the sly one complains, saying that we should trust her word, despite the evidence of facts that create doubts instead of certainties, we feel that we are being hoodwinked. The result is that we become enraged, with good reason, and little by little build up hostile and negative feelings toward the one we meant only to love. Such feelings do us great harm and, curiously, make them happy, because they are the proof that we are suffering over what they did.

In the long run, then, a duplicity of feelings takes shape that confuses the nature of the relationship: we will nurture negative and, at the same time, positive feelings for one and the same person.

This simultaneous duplicity destroys us because we can no longer define what we feel in order to polarize our attitudes. The positive feelings we naively created act as a brake that does not allow us to turn fully hostile toward them. The negative feelings prevent us from enjoying the fullness of the relationship. So we are split in two, cracked, loving and hating the same woman at the same time. The bomb explodes inside us, in the heart. The mistake, once again, consisted in letting ourselves get drunk on the poison of passion. If we had resisted the fascination, the beauty, the charm, the delicacy, we would not be pushed to the other extreme. Therefore, lust, attachment, admiration, longing, and other related feelings are defects as harmful as anger, fury, hatred, and jealousy. All of them must be exterminated from our soul through analysis, comprehension, assimilation, and prayer. I assert that, if you are an atheist, it will be harder to go beyond what you are.

There is no way out other than freedom from passion. If you doubt it, try giving yourself over madly and you will see the disastrous results.

For the passionate man, I see only the following paths as possible:

1) to kill himself;

2) to become homosexual;

3) to be a resigned cuckold;

4) to go mad;

5) to transform himself psychologically.

I recommend only the last path.

The duplicity of feelings is closely bound up with the exploitative and opportunistic nature of human beings. When they feel they are losing us, they offer us love, but when they feel they are winning us, they offer indifference. As that master of politics, Machiavelli, rightly taught us, human beings are more inclined to take advantage of the love offered to them than to return it. Our companions are no exception to this law, and when they feel loved they regard the fact as an opportunity to be exploited to the full and not as an undeserved gift. The situation is all the more serious inasmuch as, again according to Machiavelli, we should give no grounds for hatred but only for fear. The solution is to keep reason on our side, to keep them from hating us, but to "punish" them when they abuse our tolerance and trust. Females should feel loved but not too much, protected but not completely, and should fear a pending little punishment whose intensity and limits are impossible to calculate. The "punishments," in this case emotional ones, should be fair, short, and impactful. The benefits and rewards for good conduct should be handed out slowly over a good length of time, so that they are well savored and remembered for a long time.

If we allow attempts at deception to go unanswered after they have been discovered, we will lose all credibility. Instead of recognizing the value of the noble reasons that moved us to forgive them (understanding, forgiveness, pity, compassion, etc.), females will take us for weak men, for their exploitative minds are not capable of understanding the value of noble feelings. They will repay our forgiveness with exploitative opportunism and not with gratitude, saying to themselves: "What a weak man! He doesn't have the nerve to stop me and passively lets me abuse his tolerance and trust." On the other hand, if we "punish" them accurately in the emotional field, making them suffer as they make us suffer, giving everything back to them while at the same time explicitly laying bare the crooked trick they pulled, they begin to admire us deep down, even if they cry, lament, and protest. It follows, therefore, that the crueler and more vengeful are more admired than the merciful and compassionate, unfortunately. Once again it is thus demonstrated that men in love ruin themselves.

Note that provocative attitudes (lies, attempts to deceive, manipulate, double-cross, etc.) are disguised and take on an innocent appearance. Besides, they tend to appear precisely when the atmosphere between the couple is wonderful, for females have not the slightest respect for the well-being of relationships. In truth, they see the wonderful atmosphere of well-being as an opportunity to be seized, that is, a sign that the most propitious moment has come to double-cross us, for it is the moment when we are most pliable and "nice." They believe they must seize this moment as soon as possible. This is the reason why they suddenly spoil good times together. They tend to surprise us by spoiling our good moments with negative attitudes when we are friendly. They cultivate our expectation of certain attitudes and surprise us with the opposite attitudes, making the duplicity of feelings inevitable. Our feelings, sincerity, and trust are seen as objects to be used without the slightest consideration. Hence the importance of armoring ourselves at this level.

Observe, moreover, the behavior of your companion and you will discover many lies and disguised manipulations. You will also discover many sophisticated wiles for undermining distrust and inducing you to credulity. How can you feel only love for a woman like that? It is not possible, for she is provoking love and hatred at the same time. Therefore, there is no way out: the only way to avoid the duplicity of feelings is to have no feeling at all, neither good nor bad!

Provocations are a thermometer. Curiously, by provoking your fury, your partner will be measuring the intensity of your passion. She will have the exact measure of your feelings, because submission occurs in inverse proportion to your capacity to be hostile to her, hurt her, and mistreat her. Your powerlessness to cause her any kind of harm reveals how much you like her and desire her. Passionate love acts as a brake on hatred, imposing a limit on destructive attitudes. That is why pure male hatred, unmixed with passion, terrifies them so much.

Through tests and observations, the limits of husbands and boyfriends become known. If all goes well, that is, according to selfish female plans, the provocations should never exceed the limits of aggressive and murderous male fury. When that happens, a tragedy takes place, and it was due to a miscalculation by the woman or to some unforeseen event that revealed dangerous secrets. Of course, the aggressive attitudes of men who lose their heads are wrong and we do not approve of them, but it so happens that, very often, it is the woman herself who provokes them.

Irritating provocations are closely related to a behavioral tendency that makes them absolutely resistant to control: the habit of doing exactly what they perceive we do not want them to do. We dismantle this vice if we become “slippery” and disconcerting. We become disconcerting when we talk little and agree with everything, but at the same time sabotage everything and cooperate with nothing, leaving them to act alone while we observe them “from the outside.”

When she is unable to cause romantic suffering and definitively concludes that she will never win the war of passion, the woman will wait for a strategic moment that allows a sudden withdrawal leaving strong marks, memories, and expectations hanging in the air. In a last desperate act, she will show herself wonderful in every sense in the hope of leaving a very strong mark on the man’s memory and feelings, in an attempt to induce him to get drunk on it, before leaving him without warning. If you weaken and get drunk on this poison, she will then go away without freeing you from these chains, so that you suffer forever. It will have been your last time. Somehow, through the most varied devices, your goddess-demon will keep hopes alive in your mind to induce you to wait for all eternity. Perhaps she will lie, saying that one day she will come looking for you again. Perhaps she will say clearly that she does not want you anymore but will purposely smile sweetly or, hypocritically, appear worried about you and caring, so that your hope is kept alive, which constitutes an act of bad faith. Certainty, definition, and clarity will be denied intentionally and consciously. Deep down, despite appearances, she will find a way not to free you, to leave you waiting. And she will not feel like a criminal, for her nature will not allow her to understand the horror of the emotional crime she has committed. Note that they act as if we had no feelings and, without hesitation, offend what is most important and dear to us: the love we feel for them.

The duplicity of feelings arises from contradictory behaviors that feed or stimulate male hopes and then frustrate them, playing these opposites off alternately. The examples are very well known, but I will cite them once more: responding to a man's courtship, giving him hope, only to reject the suitor as soon as he approaches; accepting a phone number, implying that she will call, and not calling, so that we are left waiting; making a date and not showing up, giving incoherent excuses; appearing emotionally committed and at the same time letting signs of infidelity show through, etc. The attempt to confuse in order to immobilize and disarm is a constant.

As always, the solution for getting out of these hells is to rise above these bestial emotions by attaining a higher state of consciousness. Romantic love is as stupid as hatred, because both are passionate and subjective and do not allow us to see reality.

The paradoxical female conduct that provokes opposite feelings reminds me of what the Earth Goddess, the representation of the Eternal Feminine, said to Sláine, Pat Mills's Celtic hero:

"Sometimes I am your mother and I hold you...

Sometimes I am your sister and I help you...

And sometimes I am the lover who stabs you in the back!"

The woman we fall in love with can be any one of them.

9. Shattering the little emotional hells

You must have noticed by now that females tend to surprise us by suddenly disappearing or abruptly not returning our phone calls. They also tend to promise and not deliver, to oscillate between coming closer and pulling away, to feed expectations and frustrate them, to suggest that they will call and then not do it, to provoke our fury on purpose, to do exactly what we do not want or what we hate, etc. These are the well-known little emotional hells that they create voluntarily and consciously. They do this to torment us with doubt and to test us. They want to find out whether we will despair, whether we will go looking for them like madmen, etc.

The sudden disappearance is sometimes preceded by clues and signs that make it possible to detect it: silence, bad moods, or mild disagreements, on some occasions, or, most of the time, misleading clues that suggest the opposite of what is about to happen: an excess of affection, of kindness, of eagerness, and of goodwill. If your woman is being very sweet, helpful, affectionate, etc., watch out, because you may be being prepared to take the impact of the withdrawal syndrome caused by the sudden disappearance. When you realize that she is going to disappear, stop calling, or stop answering the phone on purpose to torment you, get ahead of her and steal her triumph by ordering her not to look for you, not to call, and to wait for an indefinite time until you do. This way you disarm this little emotional game, because you order her to do precisely what she was planning to do. If that is too difficult, then do the opposite: get ahead of her by announcing a punitive decision that will turn the consequences of the sudden vanishing act heavily back on the sly one.

As a general and overriding rule, the sudden vanishing act only happens after we have been “hooked.” The female vanishes when she begins to suspect that you will be affected by her absence. The intention is to provoke growing suffering in order to intensify the passion.

Hellish little games such as suddenly disappearing or not calling work by contrariness: the sly ones do what they believe will displease, bother, or hurt us. Therefore, they are disarmed when we lead them to believe that the planned act will in fact have the opposite effect and will please us or serve our interests instead of thwarting us. Then, in order to displease and hurt us, opposite attitudes will be necessary.

Order her to do precisely what was planned to torment you. Obviously, this strategy of emotional defense must be put in context and measured out according to the circumstances, like all the others. Do not go ordering her to do something you cannot stand.

The indefiniteness that torments us so much originates in attitudes, postures, words, and facial expressions that contradict one another. In this way, we are left with absolutely no idea of the truth, and doubt torments us. What confuses us is contradictory behavior: at some moments the sly one implies that she loves us, and at others she implies precisely the opposite. There are moments when our girlfriends seem to want an eternal union with us and moments when they act as if they did not want to see us anywhere near them. Obviously, this hellish contradiction is denied, and the more you try to force her to acknowledge it, the worse everything will get. The more you argue and interrogate, the deeper you will sink into confusion and doubt, until it reaches unbearable levels. Then horrible conflicts and fights will arise and, if the man is emotionally uncontrolled and weak, verbal and physical aggression. In the end, we will be the villains of the story. No one will be interested in our reasons, even if they are solidly grounded and coherent.

The first thing to do during such hells is to identify clearly which contradictory behaviors are bothering you and creating the confusion. Once they are identified, do not waste time arguing; simply corner her by giving her a very short deadline to correct herself, under penalty of bearing the unpleasant consequences of the situation that will be created if she does not. If the woman does not change, it means that she is no good and only wanted to deceive you. If she changes, accept her, but leave the punishment pending. Above all, what matters is to discover the truth about female feelings and intentions, so that we are free of later worries. To wrest out this truth, which is never revealed spontaneously, we need to find the right attitudes, ones that can be taken unilaterally, without any need for cooperation from the other party, and that have the effect of turning the unpleasant consequences of the little games heavily back around, punishing the one who tries to play with her own little game. This does not mean that we have to stay passive in the face of the hellish little games, merely observing them, but rather that we must quickly find the mirror actions that reverse them and wound the one who launched them.

The manipulator needs to believe that you are unaware of what is going on in order to persist in the damned little games, because it is precisely this belief that motivates her, since it gives the nasty prank its meaning. While she is toying with the male’s happiness and feelings, the female takes delight in imagining that she is manipulating his mind and his belief system. She wants to induce him to imagine a thousand things so that he will suffer! Driven by the desire for emotional revenge, she tries to keep herself inaccessible at all costs to prevent the doubts from dissipating. However, if you manage to reach her somehow (which is very difficult when they take it into their heads to withdraw into their shell) and unmask her in a short, direct, clear, and accurate way, showing that you are aware of what is going on and walking away quickly before an argument begins, you will be able to turn the game around. It is important to hit her emotionally and walk away quickly, not giving a fight time to begin, because that way you will manage to leave an anxiety hanging in the air. All that matters is to shatter the wretched little game, not to win the argument, nor to force her to confess that she plays dirty. For that, it is enough to show that the wile has been perceived. When we let ourselves be drawn into the argument, we are supplying information, revealing everything we think and feel. Instead of doubts, we send certainties and confirmations.

When we deal with incorrigibly infantilized people, who enjoy playing with other people's feelings, there is no alternative but to manage the relationship by means of terrible regulations and dictatorial laws[21]. Before the emotional hell sets in, get ahead of it and announce, without allowing any discussion, the consequences that each dishonest attitude will bring. Hand the responsibility back to the sly one; make her understand that she has the obligation to answer for her actions, since she is not a child. The crook needs to learn to bear the consequences of what she does. Let us look at some undesirable attitudes that may have the definitive end of the relationship as their consequence (be careful to make it very clear that it will be she who is responsible for the end of the relationship, and not you):

- Going without calling for more than n days;
- Not answering calls when there is no real impediment to doing so;
- Promising something (to call, to meet, etc.) and not doing it;

[21] Note that I am recommending managing the relationship, not subjugating the partner against her will. The "terrible" regulations I refer to are non-negotiable rules for maintaining honesty in love and justice, not selfish norms that would put the man in the wrong by favoring him exclusively. They are "terrible" in the sense of being non-negotiable and relentless. The dictatorship I refer to is the dictatorship of reason. Obviously, the partner must be free to leave the relationship if she does not agree with the rigor of the rules and prefers to opt for dishonesty in love. There is no sense in trying to force a person to be honest or to remain in a relationship if she explicitly wishes the opposite. As Schopenhauer said: "Love is like faith; it does not let itself be forced."

- Disappearing suddenly without giving any explanation;
- Being friendly with suitors (interested males who put on a “nice-guy face” but who in truth really just want to bang her);
- Standing there listening to come-ons;
- Taking petty little revenges in retaliation for our rebelliousness.

The “punishment” for all these sentimental crooked tricks must be the definitive end of the relationship, but the sly one must be informed in advance so that she cannot claim ignorance. If we leave any loophole for this claim to be used, the tormenting will continue. If we leave the slightest loophole for the decision to end it to seem to have come from us, the plan will backfire, because she will feel free of guilt. Therefore, it is important not to argue but merely to communicate, unilaterally and with absolute clarity, that the decision is in her hands, since it will be her attitudes that will define the course of the relationship. In cases of sentimental fraud, a terrible letter of warning that informs properly has more effect than a thousand love letters, since females are not susceptible to good sense.

If you are skillful and your maneuver has been correct, the anxiety and doubt that had been meant for you will immediately be transferred back to the other side and will begin to torment her. For this maneuver to work, reason and justice must be on your side. Whoever tries to carry out this counter-manipulation unjustly will suffer the consequences of the backfire. Do not try to be a manipulator; just defend yourself relentlessly when necessary.

Here is an invariable characteristic that sums up female cunning: the wiles and little games aim to conceal the woman’s real feelings and intentions, while at the same time manipulating and testing the man’s real feelings and intentions. They want to find out what we feel and to hide what they feel. That is why they wrest defined positions from us by force but give us back indefiniteness. That is also why they swim in certainty while we remain in confusion. That is why for them everything is clear and defined while for us everything is one great cloud of tormenting indefiniteness.

The central point from which everything originates is the inner state. Therein lies the greatest difficulty of all. The question is not external but internal. Attitudes and behaviors are outward expressions of inner states. The woman’s inner states reflect the man’s inner states and vice versa. The great problem, we might say the supreme problem, consists in finding the specific inner state that produces in us the behaviors and attitudes that protect us from hell. This state cannot be described exactly in its qualia, because it lies beyond the reach of language. It can be experienced directly but not defined satisfactorily. Roughly speaking, we could try, precariously, to describe it as an absolutely quiet and impenetrable mind, a total absence of negative feelings, and a penetrating consciousness. Outwardly, the woman may see a silent, disconcerting, calm, distant, wise, mysterious, intriguing man, etc., and she will not know whether we are concentrated, distracted, attentive, tranquil, sad, or furious. But even so, this description is deficient. The correct state is a state of soul higher than the ordinary states, in which identification, fascination, passionate chaos, and mental acceleration are easily visible. In other words: we have to acquire a state of consciousness higher than that of the person with whom we interact, resisting the magnetism of all her passionate provocations, good and bad. The attempt at a merely outward change is doomed to failure; it is simple pretense.

In the correct inner state there is not the slightest desire to argue. There is no desire to impose a point of view or for the companion to understand what she does not want to understand. There is no desire to convince, and one takes no part in the damned little games. The witch with a fairy’s face plays alone and condemns herself to frustration. The solution lies in desiring nothing, demanding nothing, and expecting nothing. What matters is to make her play alone. It is the shortest path I know. Instead of taking part in the little emotional hells by trying to reverse them, we distance ourselves and isolate ourselves. We shatter an emotional hell when we die to it. Then we are able to agree with everything and at the same time cooperate with nothing, sabotaging and frustrating by means of distance, silence, and non-action. Do not try to win the war of passion; sabotage it by taking no part.

The woman defeats the man’s muscular and rational strength through her power to bring him into confusion and make him irrational. The irrational and the confused are the terrain on which they feel at ease and act with assurance, handling situations very well, because what they possess of legitimate understanding, outside the field of sentimental selfishness, is almost nil.

When the emotional hell reaches an exaggeratedly critical level, the man’s greatest urge, as he loses control, may even be to give them a few good slaps, because of the excessive stress. However, if he does so, he will put himself in the wrong and will have “given weapons to the enemy.” A good way to vent this anger is to reach them and say those truths stuck in our throats that we never have the courage to say.

The weak point through which the man is first taken, weakened, and brought down is his vain desire and hope that his companion will understand the obvious and act coherently. This is a beginning of passion, because it is a desire that clouds the perception and acceptance of inevitable reality.

The irrationality to which we are magnetically drawn, and against which we have to resist, is the irrationality of love, hatred, desire, and repulsion. She will act contradictorily, provoking contrary feelings in you, and she will create a hell when you attempt any kind of agreement, discussion, or bilateral, democratic, and sensible dialogue, because the world she lives in is the world of senselessness.

Trying to make them understand the obvious is a mistake, and the man who proceeds this way is falling into a trap whose result is catastrophic. More efficient results are achieved with the reverse procedure: silently making sound decisions. The puzzle is truly a demonic game. A wrong decision will cause a disaster. The key is to find the correct decisions and attitudes, which is not easy. Warning, cautioning, asking for understanding, trying to demonstrate mistakes, etc., is a complete waste of time. They are only susceptible to the realistic impact of facts felt in real time or a posteriori.

What matters is not forcing them to be what we want, nor forcing them to admit their mistakes. Whoever goes down these two paths will have fallen into a trap and will hit rock bottom, completely mad. What matters is to create, by means of a free and powerful will, situations that oblige them to reveal what they really want and feel. What matters is to oblige them to define themselves and to show what they hide behind their contradictory behavior. Obviously, the incoherent attitudes are meant to cover something up, to hide intentions. They aim to install and keep doubts, questions, and confusions in our heads. Disconcerting female behavior has as its goal creating and maintaining questions that strike us violently in the heart by remaining unresolved. The answers to the questions that torment you will not be given for free, even if you beg in every way. They will only be obtained by means of radical and definitive actions that wrest them out. It is like hunting prey: you must close off every passage so that the sly one does not escape and, on top of that, you must be slyer and anticipate the wiles of the deception, frustrating the attempt at frustration.

The capacity to react correctly to female attempts to induce confusion does not develop overnight. It takes a long time, and one goes through a great deal of suffering, before reaching a satisfactory level.

Any dishonest or improper behavior by your partner must be immediately followed by behaviors of yours that retaliate, give it back, and corner her: silence, distance, and no contact for an indefinite time, in milder cases, or surprising attitudes that hit them directly in the emotions, in more serious cases. Instead of arguing, act.

Observe her and discover her weak points, what she fears within the relationship (e.g., being abandoned, being traded for another, not receiving favors or money from you, etc.). Find the most uncomfortable punishments, ones that hit her directly in her feelings, and keep them at hand to use when it is just and legitimate, that is, when she tries to wound you first with these same weapons.

It is very hard to find a man who understands this, and even harder for one to appear who manages to accomplish it in himself. Women almost always win this war of hells.

When we face the difficult situations forged by human beings, we are simultaneously facing outer and inner events. Every difficult outer situation creates an astral hell: betrayals by friends, persecutions by enemies, disappointments on the part of loved ones, and also provocations from women. Only by fighting within ourselves can we overcome the difficulty that strikes us from outside. The hell must be shattered inwardly, not fought on its outer side. It is of no use to think up strategies to resolve difficult situations if we neglect their psychic aspect, that is, the horrible feelings and thoughts that they unleash within us.

10. The strategy of attacking masculinity

When they lose a sexist debate to an experienced and determined chauvinist who relentlessly demolishes their arguments and resists all provocations, some defenders of feminist prejudices[22] tend to resort to one last, extreme measure: attacking his masculinity by calling him a homosexual.

This low and cowardly wile is the most extreme among the socially acceptable ones. It clearly indicates that the woman he is talking with has been cornered in the argument and is desperate. It is a cheap strategy that aims to strike the opponent's self-esteem at its most vulnerable point: his masculinity.

When, in a sexist argument, a woman calls a heterosexual man "gay," she is only trying to hit him emotionally through shame, wounding his self-image to force him to back down. It is mere pretense: the sly one pretends really to believe it but remains fully aware that she is interacting with an authentic straight male. The proof that this awareness is preserved lies in the fact that she never dares to challenge him to prove that he likes sex with females.

Generally, this manipulation strategy works and disconcerts even experienced debaters, because this really is one of our weakest points. Few things infuriate us straight men as much as such labels. Since our masculinity and heterosexuality are basic points in our lives, it follows that such provocations are very effective at causing anger, confusion, and disturbance.

Therefore, we have to achieve psychic armor in this respect as well. Besides the armor, it is essential to have a battery of disconcerting, unmasking replies and reactions ready to pour out on the sly ones who dare to provoke us by this route.

The attack on heterosexuality is nothing more than a variation of the well-known manipulative wiles that aim to provoke specific emotional states by inducing beliefs.

This behavior is mechanical, recurrent, and predictable. Therefore, if you intend to engage in debates with feminists and their kind, be prepared beforehand. The prediction almost never fails: in the middle of the heated debate, inevitably one of them will resort to the low strategy of calling you gay (I am not condemning gays as people but merely pointing out the disconcerting effect of this wile on straight men) or saying that you do not like women, then cackling like a witch to try to disconcert you. The curious thing is that they are not ashamed of supplying proof of intellectual mediocrity with such an attitude.

[22] I am not referring to conscious feminists but rather to dogmatic and fundamentalist feminists.

By diverting an argument to the merely provocative-passionate level, such women supply irrefutable proof that they are irrational but, at the same time, they efficiently dodge the path of criticism that would expose their wiles. The adoption of low strategies is one more sign that they get flustered when they are obliged to deal with objectivity and with uncomfortable coherent reasoning. Our dear friends have difficulty dealing with the logical-rational but feel very much at ease in the field of emotional manipulations.

Experience shows that gender debates are fruitless because of the chaos that females install. Since the impossibility of an objective and impartial study is established beforehand and there is no hope of change, any attempt to the contrary will be a loss. Therefore, the solution is not to argue and simply to unmask the sly tricks unilaterally, keeping yourself armored against everything. Be deaf to the provocations, fallacious questioning, and trick questions. Simply ignore all the garbage they say. But be prepared for the outbursts of fury, the shouting, and the crying.

11. The weakening of suspicions

Females have sophisticated stratagems for undermining the distrust of lucid husbands and boyfriends who know their wiles. They are more skilled at undermining distrust and skepticism than at hiding betrayals that are already under way.

Male skepticism is the main obstacle to female manipulations, and it is gradually undermined by means of flexibility and seemingly impeccable behavior, simulated to induce in the man the belief that he has committed himself to a person of irreproachable conduct.

In front of her husband, the adulteress pretends to feel repulsion and anger at the looks of other males. She reacts with indignation when her fidelity is questioned and rids herself of the embarrassment of the signs of suspicious conduct by calling her poor husband “insecure.” This device of calling the man “insecure” tends to be quite effective and will really tie down anyone who does not have a will powerful enough to ride roughshod over the knavery and crush the wile down to its last residue. The man in love will simply fall into the infernal net of jealousy and remain trapped in a horrible emotional suffering arising from confusion, doubt, and uncertainty.

When they put on a show of fidelity and indignation, their melodramatic skill is present in all its power and reach. Some cry, scream, and even simulate suicide attempts. It is very hard to find an emotionally powerful male who can master a situation like that.

Since what they seek is to keep us in a state of doubt, our skepticism regarding their honesty throws them into a dangerous extreme position that threatens the effectiveness of their pretenses. To bring us back to the belief system that benefits them, they offer affection and good-quality sex and act as if they were honest, honorable, defenseless, sensitive, affectionate, caring, and compassionate.

What makes men go soft and see women as fragile beings is the angelic and delicate appearance of the female face combined with their undeniable physical fragility. Since they understand nothing about psychosocial wiles and only conceive of evil in visible, outward terms, human males are very vulnerable to the false belief that females are harmless and defenseless beings. They totally neglect the immense destructive power that females possess in the field of the emotions. Only after many bitter experiences do they realize the immense damage that the delicious dolls are capable of doing to their lives.

12. When they leave

You must already have gone through the bitter experience of being caught by surprise by a sudden, unexpected, and unexplained abandonment or loss of interest on the part of some girlfriend. Then you found that all that remained were questions, doubts, unresolved issues: “Why did she suddenly want nothing more to do with me? Why did she change? What did I do wrong?” Then you must have imagined that you mistreated her or did some other stupid thing without realizing it. In short: you considered yourself to blame for losing her.

Experience shows that these sudden losses of interest on the part of women are not random but follow a mechanical, automatic, and conditioned logical principle. There are psychological motives for the sudden and treacherous loss of interest: the sick desire that you suffer from the crisis of absence or, at least, that you remain longing for your beloved’s return.

When the woman believes that you will regret her absence or will wait for her return, she will abandon you. The emotion of waiting does not need to be very intense, just enough for you to suffer a little from the unsatisfied expectation. The sly ones are lying in wait for the best moment to leave the relationship “on top,” as they say, that is, victorious in the war of passion. As long as your partner suspects that you will not feel her absence if she withdraws, she will stay by your side, insisting on trying to break down your defenses to bend you and induce you to fall in love.

Therefore, the woman abandons you because she believes that you will suffer, and she stays by your side when she suspects that you want her to go, for all that matters to them is to contradict and frustrate; they want to do the opposite of what we want in order to hurt us.

Once she has really gone, there will be no alternative but to focus on the present, on other people and matters, getting involved with a new life. If you stay locked inside your house, feeling sorry for yourself and remembering the past, you will not arouse anyone’s pity, much less that of the cheat who abandoned you.

I know a young man who let himself fall madly in love with a woman who enchanted him. She induced him to fall in love by behaving like a fairy out of our loveliest dreams, but in truth she was a terrible sorceress. When he was at the height of his passion, he brought her flowers. The fairy-sorceress then feigned surprise, pretending to be indignant, so as to have the pleasure of breaking his heart. Next, she showed up in front of him with another man, immensely superior to him in several respects. My friend was simple, poor, sensitive, and, on top of that, wore glasses. He felt lower than a worm and, in the following months, shut himself up in his room and did not come out, until one day his mother convinced him to forget everything. It seems he is better now, but I never saw him again. I hope he has been cured.

When our hopes in love suddenly come to an end, as when we are abandoned, betrayed, or deceived by the woman to whom we devoted our best feelings, we become completely disoriented and destroyed. Life no longer has any meaning and, having no meaning, many even think of suicide (and unfortunately commit it). Other women become uninteresting and the whole world loses its charm. It is at that moment that we can lose ourselves for good or transform ourselves into something higher, for, as Nietzsche said, what does not kill us makes us stronger.

13. Why they reject sex without love

Why do these illogical creatures[23] become so indignant when we propose sex without love to them? Why will a man get slapped in the face if he asks a stranger, “Please, have sex with me”?

It will certainly not be because they are noble in character, nor because they are “spiritually evolved beings who have already overcome the animal stage of sex.” Female indignation at a request for cold, direct sex without love is due to the instinct of self-preservation and to the fact that such sex sabotages all their selfish plans to subjugate the male through passion.

We, the legitimate straight males, try to cheat them in order to receive sex without giving love, which is wrong. They, the females, insistently try to cheat us in order to receive the maximum of love without giving sex and love back, which is also wrong. In both cases there is a dishonest and dirty game, a war. However, there is a difference: we want them a lot, and they want us little. This is the reason why we almost always lose in emotional games.

The idea of a sexual involvement free of feelings knocks down the selfish female dreams of obtaining an emotional slave. Besides, it threatens the emotional defenses raised against the female fall into infatuation, because they feel and know very well that a firm man who resists passion is, in turn, highly capable of making them fall in love and may take them through their weaknesses, dominating them. The instinctive reaction is then to repel such a possibility from its first and remote manifestation.

Therefore, the indignation in such cases is due to the fear of being emotionally struck down by the spell they wish to aim at us. It is due simply to selfishness and not to any noble or spiritual motive.

Among the ingenious female wiles is the cruel capacity to simulate passion to perfection while in truth feeling nothing. You will hear them saying that they love passionate men, that you cannot live without passion, that there is no point in sex without passion, that sex without passion is horrible, that we must surrender and let it happen, etc. At the same time, you will see them suffering only over the insensitive men who are free of passion. The facts unmask the lies and are there for all to see; it is the ignorant who refuse to look...

[23] Female illogicality is due to its disconcerting paradoxicality.

I am not preaching dishonesty. I am realistically describing an unpleasant situation that no one wants to consider properly and impartially. I propose a solution: a higher love totally devoid of passion.

Passion is a lower and animalistic modality of love, a primitive and brute love. It is malignant in essence because it is a blind instinct that clouds the intelligence. There is no alternative: either it is used against us or we use it against the other person. Therefore, the only thing we can do is escape from this duality, from this game of opposites, and we do so when we become totally free of passion and begin to dominate, direct, command, protect, and help the woman properly.

Another reason why sex without love is rejected most of the time is the low intensity of exclusively sexual desire in women. As we have already seen, female desire, though it exists, is not as overwhelming as male desire, which leads them to prefer buying clothes or going to shopping malls to having sex. It is much easier to create a situation that produces an erection in a man than a situation that produces vaginal lubrication in a woman. It is much easier to find a female who drives a male crazy than to find a male who drives a female sexually crazy. It is much easier for a male to chase or throw himself at a female than the reverse. Chased males are few, and chased females are many. Female orgasms are rarer than male orgasms. Even though he loses a great deal of energy, the male wants sex every day, and the female wants it now and then. Nymphomaniacs are not driven only by exclusively sexual desire, as the ignorant believe, but also, and mainly, by other desires and feelings.

Exclusively sexual female desire exists but, compared with male desire, it is something faint. The wildness, the screams, the acrobatics, etc., are a mixture of weak, exclusively sexual desire, pretense, self-induction, and intense emotions of many kinds (the desire to be hot, to beat her rivals, to hold on to the man, to impress him, to manipulate him to obtain something coveted, etc.). It is this mixture that produces what looks like intense, exclusively sexual desire. The proof of this is that they do not get “all wet” for just anyone (unlike males who, in a state of insanity, go as far as raping children, animals, corpses, and mentally ill women) and, when one of the ingredients mentioned is lost, the interest suddenly disappears.

Despite all this irrefutable evidence, it seems to me that not only men but even women themselves believe that they are full of sexual desire. This is due to the fact that females are capable of believing in their own melodramas, lies, and simulations without completely losing awareness that they are doing so.

Masturbation and vaginal lubrication are often used as an argument that female desire is intense. Let us clear up this farce as well.

Female masturbation does not occur simply out of intense sexual desire, but out of a combination of weak sexual desire together with behavioral induction by the mass media. For several decades, television, magazines, radio, and newspapers have been saying all the time that the poor things must masturbate because it is good, right, beautiful, and healthy. They also imply, especially in soap operas, that cheating on husbands is good and advisable, since most men would supposedly be their enemies. Since they are highly susceptible to bad influences, women quickly absorb these suggestions, whether subliminally or explicitly.

Vaginal lubrication occurs by the same route and is explained in the same way. It is a reflex reaction of the body that results from the combination of the various ingredients I pointed out in the social genesis of desire.

Since, therefore, exclusively sexual female desire is something almost nonexistent compared with the violent and powerful male desire, it is very logical and obvious that the women being pursued rebuff their pursuers and become “indignant” when they receive propositions of sex without love, even though, on the other hand, they feel good knowing that they have aroused attraction.

There are, however, some cases that escape this rule. Those who are rich, famous, chased by many women, or have several beautiful girlfriends are normally not rebuffed when they propose sex without love. Why does this happen? Simply because females consider that these few men have a legitimate right to the prize and the rest do not. In female eyes, they would be “superior” to ordinary males and would not have the obligation to love anyone in order to receive love and good-quality sex. The mere fact that they exist would already be considered a payment. If the famous artist comes down from the stage, he will be able to have sex with any admirer in the audience, without any obligation to love her. He will not arouse repulsion, and the chosen woman will consider herself “awarded a prize” and will be envied by her rivals. The funniest thing is that if this same woman, chosen by the artist, has a boyfriend or husband, she will demand fidelity and love from the poor guy, refusing him impersonal sex! In other words: the famous artist may use her sexually without the obligation to love her, but the poor husband may not!

14. Love in its various forms

According to the V.M. Samael Aun Weor, love between a man and a woman can be divided into three categories: emotional love, sexual love, and conscious love. In his conception, sexual love would be the brute desire to fornicate, emotional love would be affective (romantic passion), and conscious love would be the disinterested wishing of good to others (altruism). The first two forms of love would be inferior, mere facets of lust, while the third would be superior and would correspond to true love. Again according to the Venerable Master, lust (sexual desire) would manifest in the sexual center as an unmistakable morbid excitement that would drive us to the act of coitus, and it would also manifest in the heart as romantic love. Poets and singers, throughout history, would have praised lustful passion in the form of romantic love and confused it with true love, because it is extremely fascinating and deceptive. This information can be found in the books Dialectic of Objective Reason, Treatise of Revolutionary Psychology, and The Perfect Matrimony. One concludes, therefore, that both the impulse to fornicate and romantic passion would be dangerous and would need to be overcome.

For Eliphas Lévi, love, in the conception in which he approaches it in his book “Dogma and Ritual of High Magic” (sexual and emotional passion), would be the worst of debasements and a monstrosity that, banished by the ancient sages, would be totally forbidden to the adept.

Therefore, it is reasonable to state that the Gnostics who idolize women and are fascinated by them, even going so far as to defend such fascination as a sublime form of spirituality, are mistaken.

As the two kinds of harmful manifestation of love are dissolved, they are transformed into a third kind: the altruistic impulse to help one’s neighbor and humanity, regardless of sex, preached by the sages of antiquity and the founders of the great religions. This modality of love is called conscious love. It corresponds to a higher feeling in which we intensely want the well-being of the beloved person. Consider this the true love.

In conscious love, there is no feeling of possession such as exists in passion. When it is directed at a woman, we do not consider her our property. Nor is there the desperate need to be together, to watch her every step, to take revenge, to control, and to manipulate. The person is loved even at a distance, because what matters is her well-being and not the passionate enjoyment provided by the sensations of closeness. It is a love that can be directed not only at one's wife or partner but also at other people. It is very difficult to reach such heights; few manage it.

All the conflicts and hells of the relationship originate in the lower emotions of passion, and that is why it is not possible to have peace while one is in love. I understand that the man in love lives an illusion, from which he is torn sooner or later to be thrown into suffering.

In conscious love, the well-being of the beloved person is more important than her closeness. In passionate love, the closeness of the beloved person is more important than her well-being. Certainly, it is not conscious love that Schopenhauer refers to when he states that "love is evil" but rather passionate love.

In his famous book "The Art of Loving," Erich Fromm (1976) gives us detailed descriptions of the sick forms of love, which he describes as "neurotic love." Fromm's "neurotic love" is what I call "passionate love" and "romantic passion." Fromm categorizes neurotic love as follows: sadistic love, idolatrous love, projective love, sentimental love, narcissistic love, and erotic love. Sadistic love is marked by the obsession with dominating and uncovering the other's secrets. Idolatrous love is the deification of the beloved person, from whom the perfection of a god is demanded. Projective love occurs when one of the partners sees his or her own defects and failings projected onto the other, and from there makes demands and accusations. Sentimental love is characterized by romantic fantasies from movies, magazines, etc., never lived in real life with a real person. Narcissistic love exists in the case of the person who loves himself or herself through the other person. Erotic love is the very same sexual love of Samael Aun Weor; it has a deceptive character that leads its victim to change partners constantly in search of happiness, which is never reached. He also calls these sick forms of love "pseudo-love," and they intensely affect contemporary Western civilization. They are forms opposed to true and conscious love, in which one should not stagnate.

The neurotic love that affects present-day civilization is nothing more than the same romantic-passionate love so widely spread and instilled in people from the time they are born. It seems to me that its female form of expression corresponds to an obsessive desire to induce the man to fall in love in order to manipulate him, and its male form is seen in the man's obsessive attempts to forbid, watch, and control the woman's behavior. The man tries to exercise a direct power over the woman's behavior, and she tries to exercise an indirect power over the man's feelings. As a general rule, the man tends to lose in the end, since he is manipulated and his prohibitions are only respected when they are in the interest of the woman who pretends to obey him. The woman, in truth, is a rebellious being who does not submit, and that is why the man's mistake consists in passively accepting neurotic love, which keeps him from renouncing his strong desire to forbid. Renouncing this obsession would dismantle the female manipulations and empty them of meaning.

Only the man who manages to free himself from passion can renounce the troglodyte, prehistoric, and ancestral territorial impulse to forbid. Control, prohibitions, jealousy, and distrust are inherent in male infatuation and make up one of our weak points, which the sly ones take such advantage of. As Esther Vilar said, the world is a matriarchy in which men play at being patriarchs.

The path to a meeting of the goals of the two sexes would then be for women to renounce their obsessive desire to be the object of the man's continuous interest, the desire for continuity described by Alberoni (n.d.), and for the man to renounce his obsessive desire to mold female behavior according to his rules, criteria, prohibitions, and precepts. My point of view is that this humanity will not tread this path, having strayed from it for good. What I see is an ever deeper mismatch, in which men idolize and grovel for women who do not value them, while women offer the best they have to a few who do not deserve it. I hope they prove me wrong.

15. Dismantling ambiguity

Let us reflect a little more on the emotional juggling acts and labyrinths that make conquest difficult. Not only at the level of living together but also in the phase of conquest (I do not use the word “seduction” because of its subliminal implications), it is common for the sly ones to send us contradictory signals and to seem to feel aversion and interest toward us simultaneously, offering openings and blocks. For example: they give us a phone number and answer the calls but, at the same time, keep stalling and resisting when it comes to setting up a date. Another example: they agree to a date graciously and without any problem but, when they are in our presence, they resist our approach or say they want only “friendship.” The simultaneity of the opposite signals confuses and paralyzes us, calling for dismantling measures.

If we are really detached and are certain that we will not miss the sly one if we lose her, we can “corner” her emotionally with an “ultimatum,” which is effective for immediate definitions, when we no longer have a drop of patience. However, if we still have a little patience and can bear to wait, an effective dismantling route is to ask for confirmation of the unfavorable signals. Let us look at this method more closely.

The sly one who adopts ambiguous behavior sends us two kinds of signals simultaneously: favorable ones and unfavorable ones. The favorable ones aim to kindle our desire in order to hook us and induce us to approach. The unfavorable ones aim to frustrate the kindled desire and contain our pursuing impulse, keeping us at a distance determined according to her interests. The final intention is to induce us to run after them like silly imbeciles.

Ambiguous behavior, made up of contradictory signals, prevents decisions from being made. But the unfavorable signals are a weak point and constitute “an opening in the flanks” through which we can turn the game around. The thing is that the sly one, when she behaves unfavorably toward our approach, expects resistance on our part against her refusals and never imagines that we might in fact accept them or even take them to an extreme. If, instead of pushing against the barrier imposed on us, we accept the unpleasant facet that is offered to us (the refusal or block) and ask the woman for explicit confirmation that she really wants nothing more than a superficial and distant relationship, we will disconcert her, and her plan will then backfire. If we manage to wrest from her an explicit verbal confirmation that she wants only something dull and tasteless, a simple friendship, we will have forced her to define herself by precisely what, in principle, she did not want, since, in the midst of her lack of interest, she had also shown interest. Now, if she showed interest, it is because she aimed to kindle male desire in order, in this way, to satisfy her own desire for continuity.

The confession of a lack of interest in deepening the relationship marks the end of our hopes for a more intimate and deeper contact but, precisely because of this, it breaks the emotional links that imprisoned us, freeing us to forget, and it frustrates the obsessive female desire for the continuity of our interest.

In other words, to accept and confirm the undesirable face of the ambiguous behavior offered to us is to make it unequivocal and clear, even if by opting for the unpleasant side. Through the self-sacrifice of our own desires, we oblige the woman who intended to cheat us to show her true face. Then, if there is anything worthwhile in her feelings, it will be revealed to us.

This is how we dismantle ambiguous behavior: by making the sly one openly admit the undesirable side that she offered us. What matters is that things are defined, that no doubts remain, and that our feelings are finally resolved. But this requires detachment, self-sacrifice, and willingness to lose, virtues that are only acquired after many years of inner perfecting.

16. Preserving the thin thread and moving forward

When we cannot bear to lose a woman because we consider her exaggeratedly important (which happens when the man is in love), it is not advisable to force her out of ambiguity. The best course in this case is to use the ambiguity in our favor.

The positive and desirable aspect of ambiguous behavior constitutes a link that keeps us hooked, a door that preserves our hopes. Whatever the favorable signals may be (smiles, friendly behavior, etc.), they constitute an opening for approach (or they would not be favorable signals) and can be used as a path toward the progressive deepening of intimacy. In this case, we simply ignore the unfavorable signals, adopt an ideal masculine profile, and keep making our way through the openings with a certain naturalness. For that, it is enough to take advantage of the favorable signals whenever they are shown, going a little further with each one, but always concealing our real intentions perfectly[24]. Let us take advantage of the openings, but let us not dare too much.

It does not seem right to me to destroy the thin thread if we do not really want to "move on to someone else." It seems more sensible to me to strengthen it.

When we want to take advantage of the ambiguity instead of ending it, the right course is not to force a definition but, on the contrary, to take advantage of the openings (favorable signals) that are offered to us, however few and in however confused a context, choosing the qualitatively correct forms of approach, of making a move, and of insinuation, and avoiding the qualitatively wrong forms, which legitimize reactions of outrage and accusations of harassment.

Therefore, in the case we are now dealing with, the ambiguity must be allowed, because it contains within itself a "thin thread" that can sometimes be considered a hope of union to be fed and strengthened. For the unfortunate man in love who will not bear the pain of loss, adapting to the ambiguous behavior may be better than forcing a definition. Adapting to ambiguity is acting implicitly, "with a certain dose of hypocrisy, as if one were not thinking of it" (ha ha), as Eliphas Lévi would say. This is how we give back the hypocritical denial of intentions and the irritating undefined behavior, moving forward without admitting the obvious and denying the evident. The overall reading of female reactions (and not of what is said explicitly) will tell us whether we should move forward, stop, back off, or give up.

[24] Which is a demand of the woman herself, who will start avoiding us if we show too much interest.

Preserving masculine severity almost all of the time will increase the chances of success in the undertaking of taking advantage of the favorable signals.

Daring with prudence

The advances (insinuations) that aim to take advantage of the openings (favorable signals) require a certain dose of risk and daring combined with prudence and good sense. It is counterproductive to make a move indiscriminately and in just any way. There are several levels or degrees of intimacy, and skipping steps when deepening it may be inadvisable.

The decisive moment

If a man does not know how to identify and seize the specific moment of favorable opening for an immediate and daring insinuation, he may cause the woman to close herself off totally and definitively. This moment constitutes a “psychic standstill” in which female reactions freeze because of intense emotions, doubt, and uncertainty. Once the moment has passed, the fickle feminine being recovers her normal emotions and begins to see the man as someone uninteresting and dull. The “hypocritical” character (ha ha), that is, the denial of evident intentions, will protect the man during his insinuations, allowing him to back off if necessary. There must always be a good excuse for the contact and the insinuations.

At the exact moment, which is not always easy to calculate, the man must embrace her and kiss her so as to disarm her completely, or he will cause a disappointment.

17. Additional clarifications

Clarifications about lust

Friends

I need to make the following clear:

1) I am not in favor of promiscuity;

2) I am not in favor of lust;

3) I am not a student of seduction.

Obviously, all of you have the right to like whatever you want and to have your own opinions, with no need whatsoever to agree with me.

My work is diametrically opposed to that of those who teach how to seduce women in order to have several. They consider degeneration beautiful, and I consider it detestable. They love fornication and lust, while I reject them head-on.

If at some point I teach something about seduction, I do so only superficially and with the intention of helping those who have difficulty finding a companion to their liking, and not to encourage depravity.

Romantic passion is nothing more than disguised lust, manifesting in emotional form. The desire to be together, to have the person for oneself, etc., is simple sentimentalized sexual desire. In the heart, lust takes the form of romance, but it still belongs to the same animal magnetism. In the mind, lust takes the form of erotic fantasies and morbid imaginings. In the sphere of action, it turns into pursuit, harassment, come-ons, and insinuations of every kind. Deep down, all of this is lust.

The lustful are degenerate[25], even if they consider themselves very macho. The destiny of the lustful man is sexual impotence and ruin. Lust is related to crimes of passion, to the weakness of the physical body, and to sexually transmitted diseases. As he grows old, the lustful man takes nothing with him. The erotic paradise has been left behind. And then, what is left? Nothing, because he chose to degenerate instead of regenerating himself.

[25] All human beings are lustful to a certain degree and in certain respects. Humanity as a whole is marching toward total degeneration and ruin. By “degeneration” we should understand moral and psychic decadence, which inevitably leads to promiscuity and to destructive compulsive sexual behavior. This word is not used here in a genetic sense.

The interesting thing is that lust is counterproductive: the excessively lustful man grows weaker and weaker, becomes more and more desperate for women and dependent, driving away the most interesting and least dishonest ones. It is through lust that a man becomes the females' doormat.

Obviously, gentlemen, you may feel free to disagree.

My rivals, the students of seduction, do not agree with me. They believe that it is possible for a man to be promiscuous and depraved and at the same time to be inwardly strong. They forget that there is the law of balance and that, if you give yourself over excessively to pleasures, there will be a compensation from nature. In the case of the lustful fornicator, this compensation is the following: sexual impotence and generalized weakness. The fornicator keeps growing weaker physically, emotionally, mentally, and spiritually.

The charlatan "seductologists" use the desire of excluded males to wring money out of them. They promise them many women through the revelation of a supposed "secret" they claim to possess. This secret would be a piece of magical information that would have the effect of provoking fascination and attraction in each and every woman. Pay, and you will have fallen into the trap, because there is no secret at all.

It is contradictory to say that women are attracted by strength and at the same time to encourage males to weaken themselves. There lies the crux of the fallacy. If a woman is attracted by strength, it means that, if you dissipate your strength, she will lose interest.

[26] This remark aims to protect them from the destructive effects (mirror-like or return movement) that they may suffer if they apply it. However, we must take into account that we will always have weaknesses, however developed we may be, and that the daring of magnetic and counter-manipulative operations must correspond to the person's degree of development. Small operations do not require the omnipotence of the great masters.

[27] I am referring to inner strength, which makes it possible to face the difficulties of life and, by extension, of the relationship with a woman. By "weakness" we should understand: passions, desires, compulsions,

Clarification about whom my writings are meant for My guidance must never be applied by weaklings, degenerates, infra-sexuals, the promiscuous, the passionate[26], etc. It only works with the inwardly strong[27] and not with the weak.

Those who have applied my guidance and found that it works are the strong.

Those who tried to apply it and came to grief are the weak. The war of passion is not bearable for the weak, who should therefore seek the path of developing strength. Only the truly inwardly strong bear it to the point of dismantling it.

Am I prejudiced against the weak? No. I stand by them, as long as they want to strengthen themselves[28].

To the weak who want to be strong, I suggest that they free the will, at least a little, through the death of the ego, and that they study the works of masters who deal with human inner regeneration. To the other weak ones, who think they are strong and do not want to change, I advise that they seek other teachings, more appropriate to their peculiar conditions[29].

Once again I reiterate that we are not misogynists. We fight cunning wiles, not people. We do not tolerate the Profane Feminine, but we adore the Sacred Feminine. Our indignation is precisely because the Profane has smothered the Sacred and taken over its space, and that is why we fight it. Only the Sacred Feminine can lead us to paradise, but for that we have to defeat its opposite, the Profane Feminine, in all its aspects.

Therefore, we are in favor of the higher and noble aspect of woman and against her lower aspect, which reigns nowadays.

---

and sentimentalism, which are the points through which we are seized and dragged along by the events of life against our will, like leaves in the wind. By “strength” we should understand: the power of the will to absorb weaknesses, dissolving them, and not to let oneself be manipulated. Strength is the capacity to resist, which does not come from the mere opposition between the conscious will and the impulses but rather from progressive understanding. The strong man does not appear suddenly, as if by magic; he is the result of disciplined work throughout his whole life. The weaknesses for sex, affection, and love are among the strongest that punish man’s spirit.

[28] As for the rest, who confuse strength with weakness and have decided definitively for the latter, I simply do not concern myself with them, though I respect their decisions and lament their fates.

[29] For the application of lofty knowledge by those who are not up to it will inevitably cause short circuits. Electrical wires that are too thin cannot withstand high voltages.

Why the ultimatum works so well with sly cheats

The ultimatum with a set deadline, carried through by means of a countdown, is the most efficient strategy I know for catching runaways, snatching the trump card from those who want to induce us to chase them, and obliging elusive sly ones to take a defined position in the love relationship. The question that arises is: why is the ultimatum so efficient?

The answer is the following: because it strikes them in their main desire, wounding them correctly. What is the main desire on which all the cheating love behavior studied here rests? The desire to be loved desperately and continuously. It is this desire that is struck when we reach a runaway or a vanished one and inform her that, if she does not return within a set deadline, she will have shown unequivocally that she feels nothing for us, thereby determining the end of the relationship. Why is this desire struck? Because from that moment on, the elusive and confused attitude is transformed into unequivocal determination. Once she receives the ultimatum, communicated unilaterally, there will be no more way out. If she remains distant, she will have admitted, with that attitude, that she never felt anything for you, and this attitude, absolutely clear and defined, will set you free. She will be admitting, through her attitude, that she was never more than a fraud, an impostor, a liar, and a kind of emotional swindler.

However strange and illogical it may seem, those who suddenly distance themselves after having bewitched us do so in order to intensify our passionate suffering. What matters to females is not to disentangle themselves totally from the repulsive male but only partially, leaving him emotionally chained.

The woman wants continuity in male feelings, that is, she wants to be loved and desired eternally, regardless of the damage that may occur in the life of the unfortunate man in love. She does not care in the least that the sick man is far away, as long as he is undeniably desperate, sighing for her return. In fact, it is precisely distance combined with imprisonment that many of them aim for. They want to chain up the dog and leave him tied, so that they can make use of the slave when they need to. If we are imprisoned by passion and bewitched, why should the sly one stay by our side, if we suffer more for her in her absence than in her presence? Obviously, she will not make the slightest effort to be present unless she perceives that the distance will set us free.

What chains us to those who go away after hooking us is doubt. It is this doubt that sustains the insane passion and makes us sigh for the adored one to return. It is this doubt that we have to eliminate in order to win the war. It is this doubt that they preserve at all costs by means of contradictory and mysterious behavior. A correctly issued ultimatum completely shatters the doubt; it turns it into dust.

After she has received the cornering ultimatum, the desire to be desired and loved continuously will push the woman back to us, because her absence, from that moment on, will unleash exactly the opposite of what she most desires. Her absence will communicate certainty, and certainty will put an end to the continuous waiting. The continuity of male slavery, longing, desire, passion, and suffering will be destroyed.

If, after the unequivocal communication of the ultimatum, the woman still remains absent, this shows that there really never was anything worth having and that getting involved was a mistake.

How to react to sarcasm

I suggest that you face her directly in the eyes, staring at her fixedly, trying to penetrate deep into her soul for a good long while, until she lowers her eyes.

Women who mock are faster than we are at provocations because they are irrational[30]. Irrationality gives them immense speed in action and reaction because it frees the emotional center to act. What guides them at these times is not the intellect but rather the lower and petty emotions to which they are accustomed.

If you were hurt by female sarcasm, this indicates that you consider the woman mocking you worthy of importance and do not yet see her as she is: a futile creature, devoid of understanding and driven by lower emotions[31]. You must reach this state through understanding and analysis of reality, until you are convinced that what such women say does not deserve importance.

With a little practice, you will develop reactions and replies and will have them ready for these situations.

[30] I should remind you that I take inspiration from Schopenhauer and am therefore sympathetic to Irrationalism and to so-called Philosophical Pessimism.

[31] Let us remember that this concerns a woman who is mocking a good man for no reason.

Clarifications about female desire

I have never stated that exclusively sexual female desire is nonexistent. What I state is that it is not what they want to make it seem. Such desire exists, but it is much weaker than male desire.

Besides being weak, and despite it, it is reinforced by the passionate madness of sentimentalisms: being the hottest, getting ahead of her rivals, making an impression, etc. On top of that, they tend to believe in their own pretenses and come to embody these roles.

It is in this sense, and not in others, that female desire is a farce, because it is not what it seems to be and what everyone believes it is. There are many women who have frenzied sex with several men, swallow semen with relish, and, despite this, are anorgasmic. What is going on? They do all this motivated by multiple elements of a nonsexual or only indirectly sexual order.

Very few men perceive this plot. It is a pretense that most of the time is unconscious but often is conscious. Be that as it may, this pretense is there.

It might then be argued that masturbation, orgasm, and vaginal lubrication would be proof that I am mistaken. Let us see...

Vaginal lubrication and orgasm are a mixture of the following:

• a small exclusively sexual desire

• pretense

• an intense emotional state (owing to cultural influences, the need to raise self-esteem, the influence of television, etc.)

It is a sum: sexual desire + pretense + emotions of other kinds.

Masturbation results from their greater vulnerability to receiving bad influences. Since they are very susceptible, they quickly embody the suggestions made in the media that preach the stimulation of lust and sexual degeneration.

In the attacks I receive, there is a great deal of confusion resulting from lack of attention and deliberate distortions. There is no contradiction at all in stating that exclusively sexual female desire exists but is small compared with male desire. Nor is there any contradiction at all in stating afterward that this same exclusively sexual desire adds itself to other nonsexual desires and attitudes, giving rise to a false appearance of orgasmic and volitional intensity. What we see that impresses us (the attitude of the fatal female and the insane orgasms) is a sum of desires of various kinds and not just a violent, exclusively sexual desire.

On the theoretical references of my thought

My studies do not follow a fixed line and take their reference from changing reality. My conceptions are changeable and are modified as experience progresses. However, definitively, MY STUDIES MUST NOT BE PLACED IN THE FIELDS OF "SEDUCTOLOGY" NOR OF NEUROLINGUISTICS.

I write this because I am already fed up with being compared to these authors, and yet people still insist on doing it. To better understand what I write about the female psyche and male defensive self-power, I suggest reading Schopenhauer, Kant, Nietzsche, Jung, Plato, Esther Vilar, Mansfield, Martin van Creveld, Francesco Alberoni, and other authors. Besides that, my life's frame of reference is the great historical masters of Gnostic-Theosophical-Rosicrucian spiritualism and of true occultism, including, of course, the great masters Eliphas Lévi and Rudolf Steiner, among others, who strongly influence my writings. However, I do NOT write about occultism, esotericism, or Gnosticism. Let it also be clear that I do NOT recommend to anyone that he become an alpha male, a stud, or promiscuous. If any sentence of mine was ever interpreted that way, it was due to a (deliberate?) distortion of its ironic metaphorical sense on the part of whoever read it. In my writings one can find elements of pessimism, irrationalism, criticism, pragmatism, spiritualism, and other currents of philosophy.

Therefore, do not try to understand my writings by taking as a theoretical reference certain silly American authors, certain charlatan neurolinguists and "seductologists," who are only interested in manipulating the minds and feelings of people of both sexes for selfish ends. And, even less, compare me to these idiots[32].

[32] Knowledge of neurolinguistics, when used in a way that benefits people, is useful, but when used to take advantage of them, it is evil.

On the foundations of my worldview

In developing my hypotheses, I drew elements from various philosophical and psychological currents. The main philosophical currents that influenced me were pessimism, irrationalism, realism, spiritualism, criticism, perspectivism, dolorism, relativism, and pragmatism. As for the psychological currents, they were mainly Jungian and neo-Jungian analytical psychology and, secondarily, Freudian and Frommian psychoanalysis.

When I state that the currents mentioned influenced me, I mean that traits and elements of them can be found in my ideas without imprisoning them. I avoided using dogmatic approaches, as if they were straitjackets conditioning the analysis, so that the theories would not be emptied of their philosophical significance. What I write is grounded first and foremost in my personal experience, which is why my postulates do not apply to contexts, elements, and processes that I have never experienced and cannot be generalized or extrapolated beyond my experience. Still less should they be seen as static, frozen in time, and eternal, because I work with the continuous construction of knowledge and with provisional conceptions. To generalize my ideas, extrapolating them in time and space beyond the contexts in which I place them, is to falsify everything I write. Worse still: to consider that I have ideological commitments to specific groups, placing such commitments above my freedom of thought, is to try to take possession of my ideas without my authorization. That is why I get so irritated with generalizations and dogmatic groups.

Philosophical pessimism

The main philosophical influence on my thought was Schopenhauer's pessimism. Pessimism is among the philosophical currents I most admire, and it was the one that contributed most to my studies. About the term pessimism, Lalande (1967) tells us:

> "First used by Coleridge in an objective sense: 'worst state'; then, up to 1815, in English newspapers and magazines, in a sense close to D: 'spirit of discontent' (according to Murray, s.v.); finally, as the name of a doctrine, in 1819, [by] Schopenhauer, most probably independently, without relation to the use already made of this word in England. – Admitted by the (French) Academy only in 1878. – This term serves above all to designate the negation of optimism (or of meliorism); consequently, it applies to every doctrine opposed to these, whether from the affective point of view, from the moral point of view, or from the metaphysical point of view." (p. 763, my translation)

> "A. Doctrine according to which evil prevails over good, so that it is preferable not to be than to be.

B. Doctrine according to which, in life, pain prevails over pleasure, or is even the only real thing, pleasure being nothing more than its momentary cessation.

C. Doctrine according to which nature is indifferent to moral good and evil, as well as to the happiness or misfortune of creatures.

D. Disposition of the mind to see the bad side of things. State of a mind that expects (whether in general or in a particular case) that events will take an unfavorable turn." (p. 763, my translation)

Schopenhauer is the main exponent of this line of thought. I understand that philosophical pessimism is necessary and useful, especially if correctly combined with perspectivism, since it allows us to face evil instead of evading it by denying its existence, but it must not become a straitjacket that conditions cognitive processes. Through pessimism, we see the dark aspects of existence. The optimistic view, in the naive sense of the expression, leads us to underestimate evil and, consequently, to negligence.

Even if we deny the existence of evil, it constantly returns and shows itself to us, undermining our convictions and challenging us ceaselessly.

Starting from philosophical pessimism, I focused my reflections on the dark side of existence. Therefore, my preoccupation with evil and wickedness is a question of focus. In my pessimism, I use an ironic language at certain moments, a metaphorical language at others, and I also make use of a tragic language. The intention of the irony is to be comic and, at the same time, to reason by the absurd, and it can be understood as follows:

"In the modern and current sense, [irony consists of a] kind of antiphrasis: a figure of rhetoric that consists in making understood what one means by saying precisely the opposite, with an intention of mockery or reproach" (LALANDE, 1967, p. 557, my translation)

Irony is very present in my texts, sometimes combined simultaneously with metaphorical languages. People's difficulty in distinguishing the literal from the metaphorical and the ironic from the tragic lies at the root of the distortions of my writings, and it is what led me not to maintain ideological commitments to any group.

According to the pessimistic perspective, the will (desire) is the origin of pain and evil in man. On discovering the will as evil, consciousness can free itself. Liberation includes the conscious rejection of life itself (NEW BARSA ENCYCLOPEDIA, 1998), which does not mean the physical extermination of life but rather a psychic death. Evil is considered intrinsic to life:

"[Pessimism is a] philosophical doctrine that affirms the existence of evil in the world, in a primary, substantial, and predominant way, its suppression being impossible, since this would necessarily represent the suppression of existence; hence, therefore, the uselessness of any effort in that direction, except the redemption of existence through the process of its self-dissolution" (GREAT LAROUSSE CULTURAL ENCYCLOPEDIA, vol. 19, 1995 and 1998, p. 4577)

The self-dissolution of existence is an inner death (death of the I) that frees us from the malignant bonds of suffering. Suffering, pain, and evil come from the conditioned empire of the will (desire):

"To will is, first of all, to will to live; but life never presents itself as something complete and definitive. Hence Schopenhauer concludes that the will-to-live is the root of all evils, of all suffering. A perpetual willing that is never satisfied, the will, at each degree of realization, multiplies desires and, consequently, pains; each satisfaction brings a greater desire, which is the source of greater pains. Pain is, therefore, the natural state of man and the end toward which nature tends. Such is the profound pessimism of Schopenhauer, for whom all the precepts of morality are summed up in a single one: 'Destroy in ourselves, by every means, the will to live [psychological death].'

For this, however, physical means [suicide, destruction of the physical body] are not effective. According to the philosopher, man can free himself from this servitude through a path comprising three stages: that of art (...), that of compassion (...), and finally that of asceticism, which consists in the negation of all desires, in the negation of the will to live, in total immersion in nothingness" (GREAT LAROUSSE CULTURAL ENCYCLOPEDIA, vol. 21, 1995 and 1998, p. 5290).

It is not death by physical means, and still less suicide, that interests Schopenhauer and the pessimists. What is sought is psychological death, inner emptiness, the total absence of desires, the death of the appetites and the passions. None of this will lead to depression and sadness but rather to a state of soul in which freedom and peace are experienced. The more intense a passion is, the greater the suffering that accompanies it and the more necessary and urgent its death becomes. We must change ourselves and not the world, nor other people, since that is impossible. Attempts to exterminate evil outwardly result in ever greater and worse side effects, which can be confirmed by observing evil in current events and their historical genesis. An ancient philosopher (Seneca, if I am not mistaken) stated that hope is an evil. I agree with him to a certain extent: hope related to the impossible is an absurd hope. When we lose this hope, we relate more closely to reality.

Among philosophers, Schopenhauer is among those from whom I draw the most inspiration. His pessimistic and irrationalist doctrine, in certain respects very close to the contemporary Gnostic conception, was the one that contributed most to my experiential reflections and theoretical conclusions. I disagree with Schopenhauer on only a few points. A considerable part of what I have written can be understood as modest attempts to contribute to the continuation of what he began.

Philosophical irrationalism

Another philosophical current that influenced me was irrationalism. Irrationalism is opposed to rationalism and can be understood by inversion starting from it:

> "[Rationalism] is opposed (...) to irrationalism, in all its forms (mysticism, occultism, philosophy of feeling, traditionalism)." (LALANDE, 1967, p. 842, my translation)

Mysticism, occultism, and the philosophy of feeling are forms of irrationalism. Philosophical irrationalism, therefore, comes close to Gnosticism and spiritualism, standing opposed to the rationalist view, which in turn is very close to agnosticism and atheism. Schopenhauer is one of its exponents (NEW BARSA ENCYCLOPEDIA, 1998).

According to the irrationalist view, reason is not the proper means for solving the crucial problems of existence, including the question of human suffering and pain. The fundamental existential questions (the meaning of life, death, love, happiness, etc.) transcend reason, which cannot encompass them and is powerless to solve them. Rationality is not a synonym for intelligence, just as irrationality is not a synonym for stupidity or foolishness. I use the word irrational in the following sense:

> "Foreign or even contrary to reason (...). (LALANDE, 1967, p. 557, my translation)

> "More especially, in É. Meyerson, that which, in the object of our knowledge, exceeds our intellect, the whole effort of the intellect being directed toward discovering the identical, and the content of our thought always presupposing a given diversity, without which there is no reality. The 'irrational' is thus a permanent limit to explanation and to intelligibility." (LALANDE, 1967, p. 557, translation, emphasis, and bold mine)

The irrational is that which goes beyond reason and cannot be encompassed by it. According to irrationalism, irrationality is far removed from ignorance, stupidity, and foolishness, insofar as it does not correspond to something erroneous that reason can judge but rather to what is incomprehensible and disconcerting because it belongs to an order of things impenetrable to ordinary understanding. The irrational (or, if we prefer, the non-rational) hides an infinity of mysteries and systems that can only be accessed by non-rational forms of intelligence, not yet understood by Western man. People should not, therefore, consider this word offensive.

Non-rationality (or irrationality) can be seen in the intelligence of nature, in the behavior and generation of animals and plants, in the flowering of life. The human being, who is part of nature, is also an animal and possesses non-intellectual forms of intelligence in his unconscious psyche. In this sense, we can say that women's non-rationality is an attribute of defense and dominance that nature has given them, conferring on them an immense advantage in relationships and allowing them to dominate man by way of the feelings.

Rational intelligence is disconcerted by paradoxes and is not capable of understanding them. The simultaneity of mutually exclusive opposites is rejected by the intellect because it is not comprehensible; it exposes the limits of rationality and can only be understood through non-rational forms of intelligence. Obviously, none of this will be understood by those who believe irrationality to be a synonym for stupidity, for such a belief implies a gratuitous and a priori rejection of unknown logics. Whoever adopts it considers that there is no intelligence at all at work behind the illogicalities of human beings, which is false.

Irrationalism has a strong presence in my writings and allowed me to grasp intuitively some highly effective (and, for that very reason, normally incomprehensible) irrational psychological mechanisms of manipulation and to develop ways of dismantling them. These mechanisms are almost invisible to the intellect when they are not translated into a rational language that makes it possible to visualize them or, at least, to imagine them coherently. This was the greatest contribution of irrationalism to my ideas: it allowed me to understand and expose the other side of the contradiction involving the question of intelligence.

Platonic realism

Analyzing some of my (often comical) postulates in the light of the philosophical currents, we can also find elements of realism, which can be understood as follows:

"A. Platonic doctrine, according to which the Ideas are more real than individual and sensible beings, which are nothing more than their reflection or image.

B. (...).

C. Doctrine according to which being is independent of the actual knowledge that conscious subjects may acquire [about] it; esse (to be) is not equivalent to percipi (to be perceived), even in the broadest sense that can be given to this word.

D. Doctrine according to which being is, in nature, a thing distinct from thought, and cannot be drawn out of thought, nor be expressed exhaustively in logical terms. (...)

More radically still, doctrine according to which the real is opposed to the intelligible and implies a [greater and infinite] share of 'irrationality.'" (LALANDE, 1967, p. 859, my translation)

"Materialist idealism... represents no more than the surface of things; the true philosophy of nature is a spiritualist realism, in whose eyes every being is a force, and every force a thought that tends toward an ever more complete consciousness of itself." (J. Lachelier, Du fondement de l'induction, ad finem, quoted by LALANDE, 1967, p. 859, my translation)

By considering that being differs from thought and cannot be expressed in logical terms, realism comes close to irrationalism, for it considers that the real cannot be reached by the intellect and that being, in essence, cannot be thought. My point of view is that, if the real implies irrationality, we have to seek non-rational (irrational) means of cognition to reach it. In other words, we have to transcend formal logic and ordinary reasoning.

The material world that reaches our senses is not what it seems to us. The senses deceive. A stone is not as we perceive it, because it contains much more than our poor sensory apparatus is capable of capturing. The world is, as Schopenhauer said, will and representation: will because desires determine the quality of what we perceive, and representation because we perceive only inner images.

What we perceive are limited inner representations of an external "something" that goes beyond the senses and reason. Our judgments and conclusions are projections of our wills (desires): the beautiful, the ugly, the high, the low, the right, the wrong, etc., are defined according to our desires. What we perceive outwardly is a projection of inner states, which correspond to the world of ideas (ideas are inner phenomena).

From the point of view of realism, I consider, for example, that beautiful people are not beautiful in themselves and that beauty is in the eye of the beholder, so that one and the same person may be considered beautiful or ugly simultaneously by different observers. The qualities of objects, beings, animals, and people do not exist objectively outside of us; they are attributed meanings (ideas) that prevail over what is sensible. A certain way of dressing or carrying oneself will cause a person to be seen as beautiful or ugly. The proof of the subjectivity of beauty lies in the fact that its criteria vary across time, space, cultures, and individuals. Therefore, beauty does not exist outside of man; it is an inner projection.

Starting from realism, I consider that the material world is illusory, that the spiritual is the real, despite its unintelligibility, and that reality transcends the intellect. Platonic realism drew my attention to the possible existence of other logics.

In Plato's books, Socrates states several times that the passions confuse man and chain him to the world of illusions, that the soul freed from the chains of the physical body can see reality more fully, and that man must seek liberation from the instincts if he wishes to be happy after the death of the physical body. For Socrates, it is the clear understanding of reality that sets man free. And true understanding comes from absolutely sincere reflection. This is exactly my view, and I do not disagree with this venerable master, unjustly murdered by human ignorance.

Other influences

So as not to stretch the explanation out too much, I will mention other influences in a more summarized form.

Spiritualism, in its Gnostic-Theosophical-Rosicrucian-occultist-esoteric form, contributed by pointing to an alternative to blind, gratuitous belief in the invisible, lacking any proof, providing means for obtaining authentic knowledge of the "Great Beyond."

Peircean pragmatism provided important conceptual tools, such as the idea of the "fixation of belief" and the "irritation of doubt," besides drawing my attention to the need to give my writings the most practical slant possible, continually seeking to direct them toward some form of use.

Since I do not believe in absolute knowledge (and still less where the sphere of rational knowledge is concerned), we can say that there are many elements of philosophical relativism in the ideas I defend. Starting from Nietzschean perspectivism, I realized that the problems that interested me, the targets of my reflections, could be approached from different angles or points of view, and that the two poles or sides of a single problem that interested me could be subjected simultaneously to favorable and unfavorable criticism, there being, from a strictly logical (though not always formal) point of view, the possibility of the coexistence of several critical positions, often even antagonistic ones. In other words, my ideas reflect just one more perspective to be considered, alongside which other different but equally valid views can coexist. Those uninitiated in perspectivism suppose, for example, that unfavorable criticism of an object implies a favorable position toward its opposite, which is totally mistaken. They also suppose that it is impossible to make criticisms and adopt positions that are simultaneously favorable and unfavorable toward one and the same object, which is a naive conclusion. If I make unfavorable criticisms of the Greeks, that does not mean that I cannot make favorable criticisms of those very same Greeks, or equally unfavorable criticisms of the Trojans. In fact, anyone can make simultaneously favorable and unfavorable criticisms of the two poles of a problem, as long as they want to. This is a valid justification for the unrestricted freedom of criticism defended by Spinoza, for whom the suppression of the freedom to philosophize would destroy social peace. According to his thought, happiness would only be possible in the full expression of freedom of thought. Democratic political organization should be based on freedom of thought and opinion at all levels (Baruch Spinoza, Tractatus Theologico-Politicus, quoted in NEW BARSA ENCYCLOPEDIA, volume 13, 1998).

We also find elements of dolorism in my hypotheses. Dolorism, the philosophical doctrine which holds that suffering is inherent to life and that moments of happiness are mere temporary interruptions of pain, made me think about the importance of not turning our backs on human pain, especially emotional pain, since the suffering of others is a variant of our own suffering:

"Doctrine that attributes great moral, aesthetic, and above all intellectual value to pain—especially physical pain—not only insofar as it makes man sensitive to the sufferings of others, but also insofar as it checks the impulses of animal life and thus allows the spirit to acquire a hegemony particularly effective for artistic and literary creation" (Julien Teppe, quoted by LALANDE, 1967, p. 263, my translation)

In addition, my habit of philosophizing about the human psyche aroused in me a special interest in some currents of psychology, mainly analytical psychology, transpersonal psychology, and psychoanalysis. Ideas related to the concreteness of the psyche, the provocations of the anima upon the animus, neurotic love, the relationship between Logos and Eros, as well as concepts such as archetype, complexes, libido, ego, id, superego, collective unconscious, transpersonal unconscious, etc., are elements of psychology that I frequently use in my analyses.

Subjectivizing emotionality

Women are not devoid of intellect. However, their intellect is normally subordinated to their feelings (which does not imply stupidity, but rather a different mode—a faster one, it should be said—of intelligence and even of cunning). They are as slippery as fish, because feelings are much faster than thoughts, but they are subjective in their more general decisions.

Likewise, men are not devoid of feelings, but their feelings are, most of the time and as far as possible, directed by the intellect, which slows down their action and impels them to think and plan more than to act in the field of love.

Men are beings of predominantly intellectual orientation, and women are beings of predominantly emotional orientation.

Only sporadically are these modes of functioning reversed. The feminine aspect[33] of a man can dominate him and make him emotional, passionate, and subjective. That is what happens in passion. The masculine aspect of a woman[34] can dominate her and make her cold, objective, and masculinized. In both cases the person ceases to be attractive to the opposite sex.

We males try to solve problems by thinking, and they try to solve them by feeling. Each of these functions has its usefulness and its own sphere of action. Feelings are useful as intuitive mechanisms of cognition but harmful in the course of an analysis. Analysis

[33] The "anima," according to Jung.
[34] The "animus," according to Jung.

must be cold and objective and is, therefore, a more masculine attribute. That is why few women have made great discoveries, inventions, and theories that have gone down in history[35]. The few who managed to do so did it at the expense of their feminine charms[36].

What makes woman enchanting[37], and at the same time dangerously bewitching, are precisely the characteristics sacrificed and lost by those who try to be like men. These characteristics make them wonderful and, precisely for that reason, dangerous, insofar as it is precisely what gives us the best sensations that makes us addicted and dependent.

The dialectic of woman thus brings us enchantment and suffering. Therefore, feminine enchantment is dual, simultaneously wonderful and "hellish." It is something analogous to a drug: it can heal or make us sick. They administer its effects on us at will, unless we have become more powerful than they are emotionally.

What I am saying is not comprehensible to the uninformed who lack experience.

Attempts to reach women through the intellect are a waste of time, because there is no intellect susceptible of being reached. From the point of view of linear logic, there is only an inert intellect, which gets little exercise[38] and follows in the footsteps of feeling. It is not possible to convince them through logic[39]. Logic does not impact them; it has no effect whatsoever. Trying to reach them through the intellect is like trying to reach nothingness, the void. They are susceptible only to emotional impacts. That is where the weak point lies, and also the strong point: in the feelings.

Therefore, a "dispute" with a woman must take place on the level of feelings in order to have any effect. Do not try to settle quarrels by arguing, asking questions, trying to make her think, understand, etc. Reach her in her feelings, and then she will understand.

---

[35] Whereas men have made many discoveries, mainly in order to serve them.

[36] Some women, such as Esther Vilar and many others, seem to be exceptions.

[37] Woman's enchanting characteristics are not in themselves the problem; the problem is their selfish instrumentalization for purposes of manipulation.

[38] For, throughout history, men have always reasoned on behalf of and for women, being their slaves, relieving them of the uncomfortable and tedious task of linear, focal, heavy, exhausting reasoning that excludes opposites. That is why the aridity of the intellect is more bearable for men. Feminine intelligence is not rational; it is emotional and intuitive, and for that reason it is faster and lighter than the masculine intellect, which is sluggish, powerful, and heavy. Put another way: feminine rationality is not focal-linear but rather comprehensive, multi-relational, intuitive, and emotional.

[39] Put another way, so as not to scandalize so much, we could state that the feminine intellect is governed by a paradoxical logic almost incomprehensible to the masculine intellect, which is governed by linear logic.

Only the man free of passion, who has total control of his emotional center and knows the attitudes that will produce the desired emotional effect, reaches them correctly in their feelings. A minimal error of calculation, and the results will be disastrous.

Males are not devoid of feelings. We possess, just as they do, an emotional center, but we do not exercise it consciously, and the sly ones know this very well, taking advantage of this weakness and lack of skill to wound us exactly there without rest, for they are superior to us in emotional intelligence. Hence, it is legitimate to return such "attacks" to them, with all their effects, when we receive them.

The first requirement is to be absolutely impenetrable to every form of provocation of any feelings whatsoever. The second is to know the emotional effects and impacts of our attitudes and words. In this way, the problems are solved.

Restrictions on "cornering"

It is not advisable to use "cornering"[40] full-time, but only in truly critical situations, because that would be the same as trying to force the other person to be something different from what she is. Trying to force a woman to be clear and definite full-time is to give her more than enough reasons to pretend to be what we want. Since woman is ambiguous by nature, we cannot force her to be the opposite, because that would be an assault on her fundamental nature. By doing so, we would give her reason to assault our masculine nature as well.

Adultery has become the rule

Nowadays, adultery is the rule and not the exception, and this is the reason it was decriminalized. And indeed, how could something that practically everyone commits continue to be a crime? Here we have yet another reason to repudiate amorous passion.

Restrictions on the "ultimatum"

It is not advisable to use the "ultimatum"[41] when we still have residues of amorous, passionate feelings for the woman because, by doing so, we risk falling into a [40] "Cornering" is the act of leaving the woman no other way out than to define herself clearly and unequivocally and to reveal what she really feels and wants in the relationship.

[41] The "ultimatum" is the act of communicating a final radical, irrevocable, and definitive decision, in an attempt to bring the woman back to us before we abandon her for good.

ridiculous situation in which we are struck down by our own decision, thus giving rise to a tragicomedy, to the delight of the sly one, who will have a lot of fun with it. As Schopenhauer (2004) said, it is not advisable to try to conceal our feelings before women, because they quickly perceive them. The best thing is really to overcome the passionate weakness and not to simulate having overcome it. On realizing that we still like her, the sly one may simply take advantage of the opportunity offered by the ultimatum to break off the relationship while keeping us emotionally captive for an indefinite time. In this case, it will be we ourselves who have given her the chance to abandon us at the wrong time, that is, at a moment that is unfavorable to us. In general, this results in comical situations in which the man protests against the decisions he himself made. The ultimatum serves only for cases in which we can no longer stand the indefiniteness and want to put an end to the little games without any fear of losing our partner forever.

On hurt, resentment, and hatred

Besides doing us great harm and causing illnesses, negative feelings are nothing but passions through which we expose ourselves to manipulation. Through inner development, man must be capable of overcoming the lower emotions and resisting all provocations, ridding himself of the marks left on his soul by past traumas, betrayals, lies, and tricks. This is the only truly healthy alternative that man can pursue in the realm of amorous suffering. Man must die within himself to all suffering, as the pessimist philosophers say, because there is no other path in life.

I have seen that many men are emotionally uncontrolled, which causes them constantly to lose their reason and to justify the preventive measures that society takes against their fits of rage. It would be much better for them to practice meditation and self-observation instead of giving themselves over to bestial feelings that harm them. Unfortunately, when I tell them this, they often become enraged, offend me, and insult me with curses instead of arguing calmly.

Conclusions

The Sacred Feminine (the part that expresses itself in sincere women) deserves all respect and reciprocation; that is, the sincere woman must have her merits recognized and reciprocated.

To state that women possess a sublime and wonderful aspect that corresponds to the Sacred Feminine is to state that there are sublime and wonderful women alive and walking upon the Earth. However, except in truly unequivocal cases, we cannot count on them very much, even if we want to, for their opposites, the sly ones, are not few and simulate sincerity to perfection.

In love, tricks are nowadays the rule. That being so, it is better to be realistic, prepare for the worst, and not waste time waiting for what is unlikely.

Inner silence, non-action, acceptance, and certain just actions—specular, returning, refractory, or unmasking—are ways of countering the wiles of the Profane Feminine.

Masculine desire is continually sought by women.

Impartial observation is a means of understanding them.

Feminine feelings, thoughts, actions, and opinions are seen as absurd, illogical, and incoherent by us men, because they are paradoxical (they articulate mutually exclusive opposites that, from our perspective, could not coexist). Trying to force them to adopt a masculine worldview is a mistake. Trying to compel them to see the world from the perspective of masculine rationality, linear and focal, is equally a mistake.

Illogicality and non-rationality are other forms of logic and rationality: of an emotional, intuitive, comprehensive, non-linear, non-focal, and paradoxical kind.

We should not try to change the world or other people, but rather ourselves.

We should see women naturally and not as “beings from another world.” The feminine world of love is the world of indirect, ambiguous, and subliminal communications.

Sex is not the main goal of the feminine world.

Sex is the main goal of the masculine world.

Feminine sexual desire is not as genitalized as masculine desire and is fused with desires of other orders.

Getting irritated by feminine sarcasm is reinforcing it.

Arguing with women only makes the relationship worse.

Men ARE NOT useless beings.

Men are desperate for women and sacrifice themselves for them, being incapable of living without feminine affection, with rare exceptions.

The knowledge developed in this book, and in the previous ones, constitutes only a provisional “theoretical model” that aims to help (adult) men by making the stressful behavioral contradictions of women in the realm of love comprehensible. Theoretical models must always be replaced by more refined theoretical models, and I hope this one will be too. It is not my wish to form fanatical, dogmatic, and extremist readers, devotees of stupidity and fixed conceptions, which would be anti-philosophical. If you have this tendency toward ignorance, I suggest you throw this work in the trash and never read it again. I do not write for the stupid.

All the criticisms developed here are limited to the terrain of love and do not extend to others. I would very much like to be wrong about the reality of love and of the human soul, but, unfortunately, my commitment to the truth does not allow me to write the opposite of what I observe, verify, and confirm daily, at least for now. If my ideas are refuted one day, I will be very happy about it.

Bibliographical references:

ALBERONI, Francesco (n.d.). Eroticism: Fantasies and Realities of Love and Seduction (Élia Edel, trans.). São Paulo: Círculo do Livro. (Original from 1986).

FROMM, Erich (1976). The Art of Loving (Milton Amado, trans.). Belo Horizonte: Itatiaia.

GREAT LAROUSSE CULTURAL ENCYCLOPEDIA, volume 19 (1995 and 1998). São Paulo: Larousse and Nova Cultural Ltda.

GREAT LAROUSSE CULTURAL ENCYCLOPEDIA, volume 21 (1995 and 1998). São Paulo: Larousse and Nova Cultural Ltda.

LALANDE, André (1967). Vocabulario Técnico y Crítico de la Filosofía (Oberdan Calleti, trans.). Buenos Aires: El Ateneo Pedro Garcia S. A. Original by the French Society of Philosophy. Work awarded a prize by the French Academy.

NEW BARSA ENCYCLOPEDIA, volume 13 (1998). São Paulo: Encyclopaedia Britannica do Brasil Publicações Ltda.

SCHOPENHAUER, Arthur (2004). The Art of Dealing with Women (Eurides Avance de Souza, trans. from the German, Karina Jannini, trans. from the Italian, Franco Volpi, rev. and ed.). São Paulo: Martins Fontes. Anthology of excerpts taken from 8 originals.

About the author

The author of this work IS NOT A PSYCHOLOGIST, NOR IS HE ANYONE'S MASTER. He FLATLY REFUSES DISCIPLES and does not want followers of any kind. He simply exercises his right to think freely about suffering in love and wishes people to think for themselves. His ideas were published to be discussed so that they might be improved critically, and they are not intended for immature, dogmatic, or extremist people. This is not a recipe book, nor is it a manual!

The author DISAPPROVES of the formation of any doctrinal groups based on his ideas, which he wishes to be only starting points for deeper reflections and bridges to other authors and other points of view. Being a free thinker and a true lover of the continuous construction of knowledge, he DOES NOT ALWAYS AGREE WITH HIMSELF and considers that many of his ideas may be wrong! His ideas were published to be questioned and discussed rather than praised or disparaged. They are just one more point of view among the possible ones (perspectivism).

The author considers that all human beings have the right to philosophize, that is, to think in a critical, deep, careful, and concentrated way. All those who say they are his disciples are IMPOSTORS!

There are no groups representing this author's ideas anywhere in the world, virtual or otherwise. There are only groups with points of view similar to his in certain respects.

Those who are not capable of continually modifying their points of view should not meddle with deep thoughts!

Glossary

This glossary was added to the English edition and is not part of the Portuguese original. It lists the author's key concepts that appear in this book, with the original Portuguese term and the English rendering used throughout the translation.

alpha male (macho alfa) — The dominant male of ethology, as used in discussions of attraction.

complexes (complexos) — Used in the psychoanalytic sense; the author treats complexes, egos, and defects as near synonyms.

conscious love (amor consciente) — Following Samael Aun Weor, the higher form of love, as opposed to sexual and emotional (romantic) love: a disinterested wish for the beloved's well-being, free of possessiveness and of the need for closeness. The author considers it the true love.

cornering (encurralamento) — The author's strategy of placing someone before a choice that exposes their real intentions.

death of the egos (morte dos egos) — The inner work of dissolving the egos; for the author, the source of freedom from manipulation and of resistance to all passions.

duplicity of feelings (duplicidade de sentimentos) — The split produced in a man by a woman's contradictory conduct, which feeds his hopes and then frustrates them, so that he comes to love and hate the same woman at once. The author sees freedom from passion as the only way out.

ego, egos (ego, egos) — In the Gnostic sense used by the author (after Gurdjieff and Samael Aun Weor), the many psychological defects that make up the ordinary personality, not a single unified self.

emotional center (centro emocional) — From Gurdjieff and Samael Aun Weor: the psychic center of feelings, distinct from the intellectual and motor centers. The author holds that a man must master it to stay immune to emotional provocation and manipulation.

enamored party (apaixonante) — The author's term for the one who falls in love and is manipulated through that passion.

fascination (fascinação) — The capture of consciousness by an object of desire or aversion; for the author, the same phenomenon as enchantment, bewitchment, and hypnosis.

female (vs. Woman) (fêmea (vs. Mulher)) — The author contrasts the authentic, capitalized Woman with the instinctive "humanoid female animal."

freedom from passion (desapaixonamento) — The state of a man who has eliminated the egos of romantic passion and attachment, which the author presents as the precondition for not being dominated or tormented in love.

horrification (horrorização) — The author's term, after Eliphas Lévi, for making a strong and harmless impression on a woman by contradicting her convictions about what is beautiful or correct; never a threat or real danger.

humanoid (humanóide) — The author's term for the ordinary human being: a rational animal driven by instinct and by the ego, which merely has a human appearance and has not yet become an Authentic Man.

mirror effect (efeito especular) — The return of a repelled spell or manipulation to the one who cast it.

passions (paixões) — In the classical philosophical sense: desires, fears, and attachments that sweep the will along, not only romantic love.

psychic standstill (parada psíquica) — The paralysis of thought that comes from searching for the perfect reply in the middle of an argument.

Sacred Feminine / Profane Feminine (Sagrado Feminino / Profano Feminino) — The author's opposition between the higher, noble aspect of woman, which he says he adores, and her lower aspect, which he says prevails today and which he fights. He presents his criticism as aimed at the Profane Feminine, not at women as persons.

seductology (sedutologia) — The author's name for the study and techniques of seduction, from which he distances himself.

self-defense (legítima defesa) — For the author, the only case in which dismantling another's manipulations, or returning them, is justified.

sentimental selfishness (egoísmo sentimental) — The author's name for the principle that, in the war of passion, only one's own feelings matter. It drives the sly ones to judge as "logical" whatever gives them desirable feelings and to seek constant proof that the man is suffering for love.

spell, sorcery (feitiço, feitiçaria) — Used psychologically: an extreme form of fascination that works through the victim's belief and fear.

ultimatum (ultimatum) — In the author's strategy, a final demand that forces a definite decision.