MAN'S SUFFERING IN LOVE—VOLUME I

How to Deal with Women

Notes on a Female Behavioral Profile in Romantic Relationships with Men

By Nessahan Alita, March 2005

ALITA, Nessahan (2005). How to Deal with Women: Notes on a Female Behavioral Profile in Romantic Relationships with Men. In: Man's Suffering in Love—Vol. I. Independent online edition, 2008.

Abstract:

The art of dealing with women in love demands of a man an appropriate inner state, one that allows him to resist feminine charms and fascinations, and a strategic knowledge that allows him to dismantle romantic trickery and attempts to induce him to fall in love.

Keywords:

female manipulative wiles - emotional defense - suffering in love - passion - masculinity

Warning

This work should be read in a spirit of humor and solidarity, never in a spirit of revolt.

This book teaches the art of dismantling and neutralizing female wiles in love and of protecting oneself against the emotional damage of passion, and it cannot be invoked as an incentive for, or as support for, any form of negative feeling. Its critical, direct, ironic, and incisive tone reflects only the pointing out of flaws, errors, and wiles.

This work does not support the formation of any sectarian group. The wiles denounced, unmasked, and described here correspond to feminine expressions, largely unconscious, of behavioral traits common to both genders. The profile outlined corresponds only to a specific type of woman: the one who is ruled by sentimental selfishness. The author makes no pronouncement on the percentage of incidence of this profile among the female population of the various countries.

Nor does the author accept responsibility for misinterpretations, biased readings, undue generalizations, or intentional distortions that may be made under any pretext whatsoever, nor for misuse of this knowledge. Those who distort it or use it improperly will have to answer for their acts alone.

The author is a freethinker and has no ideological commitments to any political, religious, sectarian, or other group.

HOW TO DEAL WITH WOMEN

By Nessahan Alita, March 2005

"'Give me your little truth, woman!' I said. And the little old woman spoke thus:
'Do you go among women? Do not forget the whip!' Thus spoke Zarathustra." (Nietzsche)

"I turned again and set my heart to know, and to inquire, and to seek out wisdom and reason, and to know the folly of wickedness and the foolishness of madness. And I found a thing more bitter than death: the woman whose heart is snares and nets, and whose hands are bands; whoever is good before God shall escape from her, but the sinner shall be taken by her." (Ecclesiastes 7:25–26)

The criticisms contained here do not apply to sincere women.

I dedicate this book to the people who suffer in the tireless search for sincerity in love.

Introduction

In this work I will portray the negative side, the dark and destructive face of the feminine, which, unfortunately, in these decadent present days corresponds to a good part of the women in existence. I will not address its divine and celestial side, which is equally real, but only the negative aspect, which must be overcome so that woman will voluntarily hand us the keys to paradise. Purely as a matter of focus, only this side will be criticized.

Whoever opens this book must always keep in mind the fact that I am describing a specific type of woman—the sly romantic cheat—and that the characteristics pointed out are, most of the time, unconscious. The signs of this unconsciousness are women's strong reactions of resistance against every attempt to communicate this reality to them: indignation, surprise, fury, or summary denial. In this book I am not concerned with sincere women, and everything I explain, detail, and describe is nothing more than one great hypothesis and nothing else. It is not an absolute and immutable truth that cannot be questioned or that it is forbidden to doubt. What I describe here is the feminine form taken by human characteristics that belong to both sexes. If I do not concern myself with the masculine form those characteristics take when they manifest, it is simply because that is not the goal of this book, and also because a great many books have already been written about it. I hope I will not have to repeat this a million times. I am already tired of stressing these points so much.

Skill in dealing with the dark side of women consists in assimilating a body of knowledge that almost amounts to a science. I disagree with the thinkers who considered them incomprehensible.

Women are deliciously terrible, two-faced beings who ease our pains and, at the same time, make us suffer terribly. Sometimes they torment us with their contradictory games and inconsistencies, driving us mad. When we conquer them, they present us with the marvelous secrets and delights they reserve for the chosen few. They are not inherently evil; they are only human, like us.

Since I have seen many men suffer at the hands of these delicious creatures, I decided to share the knowledge I acquired through hard experience.

When I was young, I did not understand why certain philosophers and writers said that we needed to detach ourselves from women. I considered them unfair and disagreed. Today I understand them perfectly and agree with a good part of what Nietzsche, Schopenhauer, Kant, Eliphas Lévi, and other sages said. The warnings of the Church in the Middle Ages, of the Koran, of the Bible, and of other sacred books about these beings, at once marvelous and wicked, are not unfounded.

The game of passion is a battle of feelings in which woman tries to win by using man's affective and sexual needs. The intention is to conquer our heart in order to command, in this way, the subservience that arises from the state of being in love.

The principles I point out apply in general to stable relationships between the sexes: to courtship, dating, and marriage, among other "modalities" (and they are therefore intended for adults only). The information was gathered from the works of respectable authors and from contact, observation, and personal experience. I can state nothing about what does not belong to the context I have experienced, since obviously I do not know all the women on Earth. In no way do I deny that the superior and the inferior coexist, or that there is a marvelous, sublime, and divine aspect in women. However, I suspect that, in these decadent times, there are not many who seek to fuse with their positive and superior part. This portion seems to have been banished to the unconscious[1]. Many seem to identify with their sinister side, with the dark face clearly pointed out in mythologies, and that is what caught my attention. We can say that the blame for our suffering is ours alone, and the blame for their being this way is theirs alone. Other paths might exist if we were different... Unfortunately, humanity prefers evil. Our share of responsibility for suffering at their hands lies in the weakness of surrendering ourselves to the unbridled excess of our animal passions and to sentimentalism. Therefore, we do not have, nor should we have, anything against women, but rather

Basically, I set out to describe the feminine strategies for deceiving man in the romantic sphere and chaining him, the mistakes we usually make, and the ways of defending ourselves emotionally (in the cases where defense is legitimate and justified). I hope I have not shocked the reader by having, like Machiavelli, dealt only with things as they are and not with things as they ought to be. The reality of what we usually understand by love is not so beautiful and tends to differ from what we would like it to be.

My intentions in preparing this work were: 1) to provide a model that would make the apparently contradictory behavior of women understandable; 2) to provide a body of knowledge that would allow men to protect themselves from emotional aggression and that would therefore have the effect of minimizing conflicts between the sexes[2]; 3) to dismantle trickery, wiles, and cunning in love[3]. It was not my intention simply to "badmouth" this or that gender. I do not curse women: I judge and condemn their negative attitudes in the romantic sphere, because I know that in the war of love, unfortunately, mercy does not seem to exist. As for their positive side, it will not be dealt with in this book, although it exists and is very important, simply because it would divert the focus of our interest. I did not create them; I only describe them as they appear to me, without masks or evasions. The complex and confusing feminine world needs to be approached in a raw, direct, realistic, and objective way in order to be understood. However, let the reader remember that this is only one more personal point of view and nothing beyond that. It is not a finished truth, unquestionable or beyond doubt; these are ideas put forward for discussion and continual improvement, not dogmas. The various discussions sparked by the previous editions made great progress possible and pointed out paths for going deeper. Criticism is always welcome.

There are no arguments in this book in favor of negative sentimentalism. We argue against passion.

[2] The reduction of intrapersonal conflicts has repercussions in the reduction of interpersonal conflicts between the sexes, which in turn will help to weaken violent behavior between couples.

[3] Which means that only women who fit the profile described here would have any reason to feel alluded to.

I hope not to be mistaken for a mere extremist and dogmatic male chauvinist[4]. Nor do I recommend resentment, promiscuity, or polygamy. The real man does not need to cheat; he does not need several women, because he is capable of conquering a woman who completes him, of wresting from her everything he needs in order to be faithful. Promiscuous men seem weak to me, unable to bear the torments of a single wife without resorting to other lovers as crutches. If you need several lovers, this may indicate that you are incapable of wresting satisfaction from just one. The superior male turns his companion into wife, lover, and girlfriend at the same time, leaving her no other way out but to become a superwoman—sincere, complete, and perfect—or to decide to end the relationship.

This is not a seduction manual, but rather a philosophical reflection on living together and on the power of the (adult) man over himself. It is a good-humored essay, though at times it gives free rein to venting, about feminine behavior and about masculine self-power. If at certain moments I provide strategic information about courtship, I do so simply to help those who have difficulty finding or keeping a suitable companion, since women often have an inverted system of values that leads them to prefer the worst men, a fact that harms them.

Ultimately, we suffer through our own fault and not through theirs. What weakens, destroys, subjugates, and annihilates us are our own desires and feelings. Woman simply takes advantage of them, using them as tools to strike at us. Hence the solution is to fight ourselves, "dissolving ourselves" psychically through the death of the egos, instead of trying to force women to fit the standards we desire. I am radically opposed to each and every form of mental manipulation of one's neighbor. Instead of manipulating others, it is better for us to learn to manipulate ourselves.

[4] Enlightened male chauvinists are totally different from dogmatic male chauvinists. The latter were responsible for various distortions of my texts. When they came across my playful and ironic language, whose only intention was to lighten the description of a painful reality by minimizing the impact of its tragic nature, they believed they had found a writer who would back their absurd and traumatized views. A misogynistic male chauvinist and an androphobic-misandrist feminist are, deep down, identical and fall into the same errors: they practice intellectual and gender intolerance, besides adopting a one-sided, fixed, and uncritical stance. I have never written for these people.

People of both sexes behave in a mechanical and conditioned way, and those capable of rebelling against themselves to the point of escaping animal patterns of conduct entirely are very rare. Therefore, unfortunately, there do not seem to be many women on Earth who show that they depart very far from the behavioral profile pointed out here.

The ideas developed here DO NOT APPLY to any sphere other than that of ROMANTIC relationships between adult heterosexual men and women. They are permanently under construction, undergoing readjustments and modifications as the discussions evolve and the facts reveal new truths to us[5]. They are not a mere set of inductive conclusions (generalizations from a few particular cases). I preferred to take the path of deduction, drawing provisional conclusions from inferences based on premises that are socially accepted, verifiable by common experience, or defended by authors I have always admired and who strongly influenced my worldview. They are not scientific hypotheses but hypotheses of a more philosophical kind, of spiritualist and religious inspiration. The concepts adopted in building the model and the conclusions, always provisional, were and will continue to be formed a posteriori (post-concepts) and not a priori (pre-concepts). Remember that prejudices are nothing more than harmful, hostile, fixed, and immutable pre-concepts. Prejudice is entirely distinct from criticism. The latter aims to point out and denounce errors; the former aims to harm.

The reader should bear in mind that I am not an adherent of rationalism and that, when I criticize feminine rationality, I do so from the point of view of someone who considers emotional intelligence and intuition superior to the linear and cold rational intellect, which is typically masculine.

This book is intended only for mature people who are in, or wish to be in, stable relationships (and therefore for adults). It is meant only for people who think for themselves. If you are one of those who go around looking for leaders to tell them what to do, masters who gather groups of fanatics, strategies for manipulating others, etc., throw this book in the trash, because the message is not for you.

[5] And it may even turn out that one day the entire hypothesis is abandoned, if reality so demands.

This work DOES NOT SUGGEST the manipulation of beliefs, but rather real (not simulated) behavioral changes in the man, which have the effect of altering the woman's beliefs and opinions about him. The change in behavior arises from inner changes, in the soul, and its expected effect is to reduce the incidence of negative feelings and romantic conflicts between the two sexes through a change in the masculine stance. This book, therefore, is entirely focused on the inner state of the man, and that is how it needs to be read.

1. Characteristics of the falsely so-called "weaker sex"[1]

1. They compare themselves with one another.

2. They are highly competitive.

3. They fight to win the man of a beautiful woman.

4. They are naturally adapted to waiting.

5. They detest feeble men and failures.

6. They get along well only with men who ignore their mood swings and keep to their own rhythm.

7. They never let a man conclude whether they are saints or "tramps"[2], so that he will not find another woman.

8. They instrumentalize male jealousy.

[1] What is set out here does not apply to all the women on Earth throughout the entire past, present, and future history of humanity, but only to the sly ones who like to cheat in love. I suspect that the sly ones are the majority nowadays, but I am not certain of it, since I have never had the chance to observe all the females of homo sapiens currently breathing on our afflicted planet.

[2] The word is used here only in the sense of an idle person with nothing to do, as defined by the Aurélio (FERREIRA, 1995) and Michaelis (1995) dictionaries, and not in any other sense. To me, any person who toys with other people's feelings is a tramp, regardless of sex and of the number of sexual partners. And what else could someone who toys with the sincerity of others be, if not an idler who has nothing more important to do? Here, the word is used more or less like the word "shrew," and it is also almost a feminine equivalent of the word "cad," very commonly used to designate men who cheat in love. The term covers those people who commit adultery without their spouse deserving it, who induce a person to fall in love with the sole intention of abandoning him or her afterward, who repay a declaration of sincere love with a slanderous accusation of sexual harassment, etc. This word is not used with the same pejorative sense in all Portuguese-speaking countries, nor does it have only the meaning that popular culture sometimes gives it. A typical example of a "tramp" is the character Teodora in the novel "Love of Salvation," by Camilo Castelo Branco. In this novel, Teodora, a sly, dissembling, and manipulative woman, takes advantage of the men who love her and drives them to despair and ruin. Afonso, one of her victims, sinks into vice and comes to the brink of suicide, but he is saved from romantic destruction by his cousin, a virtuous and sincere woman.

9. They assert themselves through the male suffering that arises from desire or love (if it culminates in suicide, no pity will be felt).

10. They do not love simply in return for being loved, but out of some interest.

11. They like to confuse us with mental "tortures"[3].

12. They have refined mental manipulation as a way of compensating for their physical frailty.

13. They are emotionally much stronger than men[4].

14. They give themselves only to those who treat them well but do not fall in love.

15. They grow sick of men who completely abandon the rituals of enchantment (little notes, poems, movies, little presents, chocolates...) or who perform them excessively.

16. They try to induce us to chase after them so they can have the pleasure of rejecting us.

17. They feel attractive when they manage to reject a man.

18. They feign disinterest in sex in order to arouse male desire.

19. They need to feel that they are deceiving or manipulating.

20. The less they manage to manipulate and deceive us, the more they try to do so.

21. They give up their games of deception and manipulation when we skillfully outwit them, letting them suppose that they really are succeeding.

[3] These mental "tortures" are the impertinences of the feminine animus upon the masculine anima. According to Jung (1996) and Sanford (1986), the feminine animus has a powerful capacity to affect the masculine anima, provoking negative feelings in the man that, in some cases, can lead him to ruin. Hence the importance of a man assimilating and integrating his anima. The anima is the feminine (emotional) part of a man's psyche, and the animus the masculine (logoic) part of a woman's psyche (JUNG, 1995 and JUNG, 1996).

[4] And therefore they are not inferior, as radical dogmatic male chauvinists suppose, but simply different.

22. They feign frailty in order to activate the male protective instinct.

23. They play on our fear of saddening and displeasing them.

24. They are patient.

25. They test and observe reactions.

26. They are irresistibly attracted to men who seem to them outstanding, better than the others, and at the same time uninterested.

27. They usually behave as if they were desired.

28. They love experienced cads and give themselves to them completely[5].

29. They desire a man in the same proportion as other women desire him.

30. They prefer those who approach them pretending not to be interested.

31. They want a man to hide his sexual desire until the moment of surrender.

32. They feign indifference to suggest that they are interested in someone else.

33. They are truly crazy about men who understand their world. They call such a man “different.”

34. They become inaccessible after the conquest so that the man will preserve the feeling they have generated[6].

35. They try to find out what we feel in various situations.

36. They tend to “hook” a man by rejecting and avoiding him.

[5] Unfortunately. Nessahan Alita does not like this, but there is nothing he can do except denounce it for the good of all.

[6] This characteristic is treated exhaustively by Francesco Alberoni (1986/n.d.). A large part of the characteristics pointed out in this chapter are in fact merely extensions and necessary implications of his theory of continuity. For Alberoni, woman incessantly seeks the continuity of male interest, that is, to be uninterruptedly loved and desired. Thus feminine eroticism would be continuous, while masculine eroticism would be discontinuous, since the man temporarily loses interest in the woman after the sexual act. The discontinuity of the masculine would have the effect of hurting the woman’s feelings.

37. They fear real male hatred, without any admixture of affection[7].

38. They pull away to see whether or not we will go after them.

39. They constantly observe and assess whether, how, and how much we need them emotionally.

40. They provoke “pursuits” by attracting and then rejecting.

41. They frustrate us by raising and dashing hopes of sex.

42. They deny us full sexual satisfaction in order to kindle our desire.

43. They never let us know whether they run away because they want to be left in peace or because they want to be pursued.

44. They are impressed by decisive men who are not afraid to take forceful action and who surprise them.

45. They lead the fools who chase them wherever they please.

46. They run away and resist to prevent their surrender from causing the “pursuer” to lose interest.

47. They are irresistibly attracted to those who provoke strong emotions.

48. They pursue the man who marks their imagination as different and special and who, at the same time, lets it be glimpsed that he is uninterested.

49. They conclude that we need them when we seek them out and chase them.

50. They feel sure of their power of seduction when they are pursued[8].

[7] And they are right to do so, because a man’s loss of emotional control turns him into a suicidal monster. Hence the importance of laws that defend women’s physical integrity. We are lacking, however, laws that protect men’s emotional integrity. The cases of married or separated men who kidnap and murder their wives and children and then commit suicide, or of young single men who kill several schoolmates (in the dangerous outbreaks of “battered man syndrome”), point to this urgent need. If nothing is done, these cases will intensify dangerously. Evil persists and makes itself noticed until it is confronted head-on.

[8] This is one of the reasons why I totally condemn harassing male behavior. The harasser obtains results opposite to those he seeks.

51. They need to raise their self-esteem by pursuing or belittling the man who rejects them.

52. They think they are desired when a man looks at them closely or takes the initiative of making contact.

53. They are physically and psychically slow (resistant to time)[9] in certain situations: they take a long time to be enchanted, to reach orgasm, to make decisions, to start missing sex; they can bear to wait a long time, they are patient, etc.

54. They feel no compassion for our emotional suffering.

55. They feel no compassion for the male suffering caused by sexual dissatisfaction (they consider it “fussiness” or “shamelessness”).

56. Once involved with a man, they go after him only if he holds out longer than they do, avoiding seeking contact and sex.

57. They become emotionally dependent on men who are protective, self-assured, and decisive and who, at the same time, do not depend on them emotionally.

58. They conceive of the ideal man as self-assured, strong, distant, decisive, and calm.

59. They dream of “taming” cads, because their conversion would be unequivocal proof of love.

60. They feign disinterest so as not to be scorned as “easy.”

61. They are attracted to the “different” male who is superior to the others in several respects, above all in his capacity to offer security.

62. They cultivate dependence in the man.

[9] However, they are extremely quick to react correctly to their own emotional needs.

63. They continually observe and test our feelings, to the point of breaking off the relationship.

64. They turn our mistakes to their own advantage.

65. They put the blame for their mistakes on us.

66. They always have an excuse for their failings.

67. They bend and manipulate a man, breaking his resistance through frailty.

68. They subdue and manipulate us without our noticing.

69. They never admit that they give others an opening to court them.

70. They swear faithfulness of feeling but contradict themselves with suspicious and “unintentional” actions.

71. They are not afraid to play to the limit, because they consider that, if the guy breaks off the relationship, the breakup happened because he was no good anyway.

72. They are affected by losing us only after the loss has actually taken place.

73. They play with ambiguities and avoid taking responsibility for the consequences.

74. They are incapable of picturing the pain of male affective-sexual dissatisfaction.

75. They discover a man’s limits by playing with his feelings.

76. They feel relief from their anguish at not being loved when they discover that someone is suffering for them.

77. They want to be loved by those who are better in every respect.

78. They are almost never satisfied with the men they marry[10].

79. They would like to have a man who would satisfy all their conflicting and contradictory desires[11].

80. They detest adapting[12].

2. The stages of the work of enchantment on refractory and standoffish women

For the good men who have not yet found a suitable partner and do not know what to do, I will now give a few tips. I do so solely to help the good ones, since women show that they prefer the bad ones[1]. However, let it be clear that this is not a book about seduction. These tips are only so that the disadvantaged can stand up to the favorites and overtake them in the fierce competition for females.

The work of enchanting has three major stages. In the first, we have no contact at all with the woman we desire to possess. In the second, we have achieved contact, but our intentions have not been revealed. In the third, our intentions have been revealed. The seduction of strangers belongs to the first stage. Friendship belongs to the second. All the relationships that take place after we declare what we want belong to the third. Let us study the first.

The guiding principle of the whole work of enchantment is the growing closeness of intimacy mixed with indifference and disinterest.

Fix your gaze on any woman who is exaggeratedly “beautiful,” stuck-up, snobbish, and not very intelligent. You will see her look away. What is happening in those moments is a rejection, a refusal arising from thoughts in her petulant bimbo brain[2]. What will she be thinking? It is easy to guess: that you are just one more idiot like any other, that you have nothing interesting

[10] This is a characteristic I have observed a great deal in our times, and one of the main reasons why marriages no longer last. The other main reason is the dissatisfaction of men, who value women for their beauty and sexual performance.

[11] I am referring to authentic contradictions, which are beyond the power of conscious control, and not to apparent contradictions, some of which are intentionally simulated, sometimes consciously and at other times unconsciously.

[12] Hence the importance of not forcing them. Rejecting change is a characteristic of the ego.

[1] It was Eliphas Lévi (1855/2001) who first drew my attention to this fact.

[2] I am thus returning the provocations of Karen Salmansohn (1994), who, throughout her entire book, compares us to dogs that must be trained (she does so explicitly and literally). Despite everything, I am referring only to frivolous women, those who tend to scorn sincere men, and not to the others. I further limit this observation exclusively to the romantic sphere and do not extend it to other spheres.

about you, because if that were not so you would have some filly by your side and would scorn all the others. So it is a waste of time to go flirting this way, because the ladies who respond will only be the very “ugly” and boring ones[3] who feel rejected, and not the best ones[4]. Only desperate women accept harassing men.

The most desirable women keep their guard up at all times, and it is no use trying to break through. What must be done is to lead them to lower their guard of their own free will. To allow this opening, you must convey rejection or indifference[5]. You must find a silent way of telling her, as if you did not want to, that she is uninteresting and that you do not notice her. To do this, it is enough to ignore her presence, avoiding looking at her body and face. But that is not all.

Once you have proceeded this way, you will have unsettled her, as you will be able to tell from her gestures and movements (touching her hair, moving around more, fiddling with her clothes, talking loudly to be noticed, etc.). You will begin to be watched, with peripheral or focused vision. Surprise her by greeting her boldly, fearlessly, before she has time to think, looking her in the eyes in an extremely serious way but still with a certain indifference. If you manage to catch her looking at you, she will have no choice but to return your greeting. Contact will have been established. Then, if you want to start a conversation, speak in a commanding tone, with a deep voice, and always be alert to emotional “counterpunches,” little jokes in bad taste, cynicism, etc. If you sense an opening, make your advances, but take care not to go beyond or fall short of what is permitted. If the barrier is still standing, that is, if the woman still remains closed, giving no sign of an opening for an advance, disagree with her opinions, provoke an argument, but do not finish it. Then offer a phone number or e-mail address to continue it, setting a period of waiting.

[3] According to social conventions. Since beauty does not exist from an objective point of view, let “ugly” be understood as those women who do not consider themselves attractive enough to scorn and disdain the sincere love of the “uninteresting” or “dull” men.

[4] According to the same social conventions. Modern society overvalues feminine beauty and blames only men for this. But in truth, the women who look in the mirror and consider themselves “beautiful” are often the first to scorn ordinary women and men and to feel superior to them.

[5] It is not a matter of simulating, but of acquiring an inner state of true neutrality that will reveal itself in your attitudes.

In extreme cases, it is necessary to make a strong impression on her, "horrifying her"[6] in a calculated way. Do not go "horrifying" her any old way: impress her in the right way, so that the result is not a disaster. A good way of marking her imagination so that she keeps thinking about you for a good while is to own up to being a male chauvinist (an enlightened, conscious, peaceful, and protective one, of course), because your rivals will always pretend[7] to be feminists in order to please. What matters here is to stand out as a different kind of guy, self-assured, who is not afraid to show his convictions[8] and who does not need anyone. On this detail, Eliphas Lévi tells us the following:

"Whoever wishes to make himself loved (we attribute all these illegitimate maneuvers to man alone, supposing that a woman has no need of them) must, at first, insinuate himself and produce some impression or other on the imagination of the person who is the object of his desire. Let him cause her admiration, astonishment, terror [sic], and even horror[9] if he has no other resource. But he must, at any price, stand out from ordinary men in that person's eyes and occupy, willingly or by force, a place in her memories, in her fears, or even in her dreams. The Lovelaces are certainly not the avowed ideal of the Clarissas, but the Clarissas think of them constantly, to censure them, to curse them, to pity their victims, to wish for their conversion and repentance. Soon they will wish to regenerate them through self-denial and forgiveness; next, secret vanity will tell them that it would be charming to win the love of a Lovelace, to love him and resist him; upon saying that she would have liked to love him, she blushes, renounces it a thousand times over, and ends up loving him a thousand times more; later, when the supreme moment comes, she forgets to resist him." (LÉVI, 1855/2001, p. 337)

"One could say that love, above all in woman, is a true hallucination. For want of any other senseless motive, she will often decide in favor of the absurd. Deceive Gioconda

[6] The first author who mentioned this strategy of "horrification," as far as I remember, was Eliphas Lévi. Several times I thought of replacing this term, because of the confusion it may cause, but I have not yet found a milder equivalent in our language. Its precise meaning here is simply that of contradicting a woman's convictions about what is beautiful or correct, and never, ever, that of threatening her or exposing her to any real or imaginary danger. This contradiction must always have a final result that is beneficial or harmless to the woman, and never harmful. It is something similar to what boys do by instinct to impress girls at school when they pretend they are going to eat toads, lizards, etc. The girls scream, run... and laugh. In the film "Hitch" (TENNANT, 2001), with Will Smith, calculated and harmless "horrification" is described by the term "shock," equally liable to misinterpretation, and there is a very interesting example of it.

[7] And therefore they will be neither sincere nor truthful.

[8] Without exaggeration.

[9] Lévi is merely describing the process of seduction/conquest as it occurs in real life, regardless of whether or not the perpetrator has scruples, and is not recommending that emotional harm be done to the person seduced. In other words, he is stating that whoever is going to seduce makes an impression on the psyche of the desired person, in a good or bad, harmless or harmful way.

because of a hidden treasure? How horrible! Very well, if it is a horror, why not commit it? It is so pleasant to commit a little horror now and then!" (LÉVI, 1855/2001, p. 338)

Lévi is referring to a little (and therefore harmless) horror. His explanation helps us understand why the female sex feels so attracted to certain bad and perverse men. They make a strong impression on women, much more than certain good men do. To outdo them, you must master this skill and use it for good, in the right way. If you use it for evil, you will bring bad consequences upon yourself.

Some women tend to seem open at first but, after contact, they fall silent to disconcert us, watching how we get out of this embarrassing situation and having fun at our expense. In this case, be brief and direct[10] in your remarks, taking the initiative to end the conversation before you end up looking like a fool. If you are on the phone, take the initiative to hang up; if you are talking face to face, take the initiative to end the conversation and walk away without looking back. Put off your advances to another day, teaching her a good lesson. This will impress her. Usually, in the following encounters the lesson takes effect and makes her friendlier... Do not make your advances while her guard is up[11].

Winning a lady has stages that go from the moment when we do not yet know her to the phases in which we have to win her back continually in marriage or in other lasting relationships. In every phase it is necessary to sidestep resistance[12] and hand her back the consequences of her own decisions. The progression of the phases could be summarized, divided more or less as follows:

1. Subtly greet every interesting woman who passes by you and looks at you. One of them will respond. When a lady looks at you, there is a fraction of a second in which you must greet her. If you wait too long, you will lose the chance. The moment to greet her is the moment when a doubt resulting from the state of surprise hangs in the feminine mind. You can also ignore the beauty's presence at [10] Without being aggressive or out of control.

[11] That would be harassment. Pushing against a woman's raised guard is the same as trying to force her will or violate her free will, something detestable whose effect is aversion.
[12] By not insisting against it and by seeking alternative paths.

first, for a good while, and surprise her with a fixed look into her eyes accompanied by an almost imperceptible greeting before she recovers from her surprise.

2. Establish contact as if you did not attach much importance to it.

3. Look her steadily in the eyes, showing power.

4. Speak in a protective, commanding tone.

5. Speak little; let her talk.

6. Move closer to kiss her. If she looks away, stop and try another day. If she does not look away, go on.

3. Precautions to take when dealing with sly women who try to cheat in love

Note 1. Never use this knowledge for evil (seducing several women at the same time, deceiving young virgins, seducing minors, etc.). Do not try to play the stud "alpha male" who bangs them all, because his fate is to be murdered, to catch venereal diseases, or to become impotent in every sense, including the sexual one, and to be replaced by up-and-coming beta males.

Note 2. This information is meant only to help well-intentioned men who are at a disadvantage in the fierce competition for females, and not to encourage male promiscuity. If you use it the wrong way, the fault will be entirely yours.

1. Never try to kiss her if she looks away as you approach.

2. Excite her imagination by making her think about you constantly, preferably as a man absolutely different from the others[1].

3. Make a strong impression on her without showing off.

4. Be mysterious.

5. Hide your sexual intention until the moment to "strike."

[1] Without deceiving her, however. Truly acquire these characteristics.

6. Steer the conversation toward her emotional problems, not yours. Do not talk about idiotic things.

7. Wait patiently for trust to take hold[2].

8. Keep the frequency of your conversations regular.

9. Let her set the length of the conversations and of the intervals between one conversation and the next.

10. Never show haste or sexual urgency.

11. Let her talk about sex, if she wants to, and show great knowledge of the subject.

12. Make her dependent on your conversations.

13. Agree with her often, but not always.

14. Do not monopolize the conversation. Let her talk freely. You should only listen and nudge the topics in the directions that matter, encouraging her to keep talking so as not to leave her with nothing to say.

Important: It is essential to perceive the type and depth of the openings given in order to make your advances accordingly. An advance that goes beyond or falls short of what is permitted results in failure.

4. How to survive the difficult game of the magnetic forces of seduction that surround female[1] cheats[2]

1. Do not be possessive. Get the idea out of your head that she is yours, especially if she says she is faithful, that you are the best guy she has ever met, the only one, etc.

[2] And do not betray it. Live up to the trust placed in you, so as to keep right on your side in case she betrays your feelings.

[1] The expressions “female,” “human female,” “male,” “human male,” etc. are used in a biological and anthropological sense, just as Desmond Morris, Theodosius Dobzhansky (1968), and other authors use them. I understand that human beings belong to the animal kingdom and are part of the class of mammals (mammalia) and of the order of the hominids.

[2] Once again, I am referring only to romantic cheats and not to other women.

2. As long as you have no proof to the contrary, try to see her as a marvelous woman with many partners who does not admit it for fear of social repression but who needs a great friend who understands why she goes out with everybody.

3. Do not fall into the temptation of seeing her as a heavenly being. Never believe in her faithfulness or that she flirts with no one but you[3].

4. Be indifferent to her games of contrary and inconsistent attitudes.

5. Kiss her ardently, as if you were feeling a great deal of feeling.

6. Get the worry about faithfulness out of your head. If she wants to put out for another guy, nobody is going to stop her.

7. Do not irritate or smother her with continual displays of love.

8. Do not be a dependent crybaby screaming for his mother.

9. When she stands you up, accept the lying, flimsy excuses you get the next day and pretend you believed them, ignoring the matter, or else go to the other extreme and unmask her.

10. Never delude yourself into believing that you will find out what she feels by asking questions or having direct conversations about it.

11. Be indifferent to the games of drawing near and pulling away that they play to drive us crazy.

12. Be a man and be prepared for the unexpected: being traded for another, being abandoned for good or for a while, being let down on dates, etc.

13. Do not become attached. Love her disinterestedly, even if from a distance.

[3] For human beings of both sexes, including those of the female sex, are inherently unfaithful. Infidelity arises from an imbalance between the forces of the Id and the Superego, that is, between the impulses of the unconscious and the capacity of the (ordinary) ego to resist them.

14. Never forget that the cruel historical reaction of chauvinist culture to their wiles has forced them to mix truths with lies in everything they say[4]. Never believe or disbelieve what they say: limit your conclusions to what you see.

15. Write her love lines very rarely.

16. Achieve total emotional independence.

17. When you are compared with some other male, remember the points on which you are superior to the guy and forget the matter. Remember: although it may not seem so, in the long run she is the one who will have lost, not you.

18. Consciously adopt a behavior that pleases her, but do not become conditioned.

19. Melt into rare and false passionate declarations[5].

20. Be firm and kind at the same time.

21. Do not mind when she fails to keep her commitments to dates and phone calls.

22. Do not believe her when she promises to call or see you.

23. Be willing to lose her at any moment.

24. Do not see her as the only one.

25. Do not try to impress her with your talents.

26. Do not show off your talents for no reason, but let her notice them little by little.

27. Do not chase after her all the time.

[4] This characteristic is also present in men, but for other reasons and in other guises. I believe that there is, in every ordinary human being, a limit to the capacity to bear the truth, from which arises a limit to the capacity to express it.

[5] Which is legitimate because, remember, we are dealing with a woman who cheats in love and not with a sincere woman.

28. Do not wonder whether or not she is going out with someone else.

29. Do not always be rude or ill-mannered in your ways and reactions; only a little, and now and then[6].

30. Do not be possessive[7].

31. Do not feel her as if she were yours.

32. Define the nature of the relationship solely on the basis of what behaviors and attitudes show.

33. Do not dive headfirst into the relationship, EVER!

34. Do not be fascinated by smiles, glances, and passionate words, but behave as if you were a little fascinated, just a little[8].

35. Do not chase after her or let yourself be drawn in. Be fascinating, so that she will chase after you.

36. To attract, combine in homeopathic doses seriousness, disinterest, loyalty, altruism, sincerity, minimal care for your appearance, eloquence, determination, economic independence, material independence (at least a house and a car), an image of a man pursued by women who does not boast about it (it can be false; just tell a very gossipy female friend that there are several beautiful women after you and ask her not to tell anyone, and she will take care of the rest...[9]), virility, intense masculinity, sensitivity, kindness, level-headedness, and intelligence.

37. Detect the contradictions in her behavior.

38. Do not expect good sense or understanding.

39. Resist negative feminine magnetism.

[6] However, we must never give in to provocation and attack the woman, because that takes away all right from our side. And once we no longer have right on our side, how can we complain or demand anything?

[7] That is, do not be her owner or feel like her owner.

[8] It is an emotional demand of their own. If they discover that they are not capable of fascinating a man, they become sad (ALBERONI, 1986/n.d.).

[9] Do not get furious, reader; it is just a joke...

40. Do not argue.

41. Do not cultivate conflict.

42. Observe her “from outside” (without identification), trying to grasp her feelings.

43. Be silent; listen to her.

44. Be distant, to give wings to mystery.

45. Do not let what is going on inside you show.

46. Train her[10] gradually, rewarding her for good behavior.

47. Let her steer the course of the conversations.

48. Encourage her to talk about what she likes most.

49. Always agree, except when she wants to be contradicted.

50. Exalt her imagination.

51. Embody the principles of higher love.

52. Do not waver in your positions.

53. Treat her like a girl.

54. Play with the binary, the alternation of opposites.

55. Hand back to her the responsibility for her acts, silly little games, etc.

56. Do not speak in a pleading or begging tone, but in a commanding tone.

57. Perform small romantic rituals now and then.

58. Be a mirror without giving her much of an opening.

[10] This is exactly the expression used by the feminist writer Karen Salmansohn (1994), who literally and explicitly recommends that women train men as if they were dogs.

59. Make her laugh only rarely.

60. Point out her virtues when they show themselves.

61. Alternate severity with sweetness.

62. Alternate silence with brief remarks that stimulate and calm her.

63. Kiss her suddenly on the mouth.

64. Tell her now and then that you love her (but not always).

65. Do not let yourself be possessed by a feeling of inferiority in relation to other men.

66. Agree with her mistaken behavioral tendencies and encourage them, pushing her in their direction[11]. For example: when she wants to go out with an exaggerated neckline, say that the neckline is still too closed and that she should open it more; when she wears a very short skirt, say that it is long and should be shorter. Go with her to the extreme limit to find out what kind of woman you really have at your side. If she refuses and backs down, she is suitable for a more serious commitment.

5. On woman's desire[1]

Feminine desire is something very controversial and disconcerting. Much confusion reigns about it. This is due mainly to the opposition between what is conscious and what is unconscious. This opposition leads women to say the opposite of what they feel and of what they are[2]. One cannot discover the factors that bewitch and subdue them through questions, interviews, etc., because we will be deceived. Know that almost everything we hear the sly [11] Therefore, never try to repress her. Any attempt to forbid or repress feminine behavior offers immediate grounds for effective victim-playing protests. You will be branded cruel, a dictator, an oppressor, etc. Do not give grounds; just hand back consequences. Make absolute adaptation to reality your personal goal.

[1] This chapter refers to desires that are unconscious but that make themselves painfully felt in a man's consciousness through their concrete effects. Once again, we must not generalize. The conclusions described here are limited to one more perspective on reality to be considered. I must remind the reader that the unconscious, in both sexes, is the source from which spring the nightmares of hell and the marvelous dreams of heaven.

[2] Freud himself confessed his powerlessness before this problem.

ones say about what they are looking for in a relationship is a lie and, moreover, is usually exactly the opposite of what they really desire. I will now set out what they try to hide and never admit[3].

Human sexuality is similar to that of horses, zebras, and wild asses. The females spontaneously go to the territory of a stallion, who settles near the best sources of food and water (material resources), and offer him their sex at will. The other, secondary males are forced to wander in bands made up only of individuals of the male sex, going without mating for years on end, until they manage to replace some stallion that has grown old. The females do not compete with one another and accept the stallion's infidelity as natural (as happens with the fans of any famous artist, mobster, billionaire, or politician). The stallion can mate with any mare in his harem without the slightest problem as long as he is able to keep predators and harassing secondary males away. In other words: the men considered "alpha males" act like wild stallions, and the women who chase them act like their females[4]. On the other hand, the men excluded by women's selective criteria are like the rejected horses that never mate. Something very similar happens among lions, among gorillas, and among other animals.

Being man's complement and opposite pole, woman has an inverse psychic structure.

We want as much sex as possible and try to have sex as long as we have any strength left, up to the last moment. For us, sex comes first and love second. For them, the opposite occurs: love comes first. But let this be well understood: most of the time, they do not want to give love; they only want to receive it, giving in return only the minimum necessary to keep us trapped by desire, by feeling, and by passion. They have a double desire. They desire the servitude of the weak and the protection of the strong. They want to dominate the feeble and needy in order to exploit them as husbands who raise their offspring, while at the same time they dream of winning the affection of the insensitive men who have harems and stand out in the male hierarchy. The weak, once imprisoned, receive sex, tenderness, and love in minimal quantities, just enough to keep them trapped.

[3] However, this concealment is not always conscious. It seems to me that most of the time the woman herself denies these things to herself.

[4] The comparison with other mammals seems inevitable to me. We can identify similarities in gender behavior among the various mammals, particularly between the primates and man. The same behavior described here among equines is attributed by DOBZHANSKY (1968) to the hominid ancestors of man. Dobzhansky further adds that, in these cases, the beta males stay on the margins of the group, waiting for the moment when they can attack the alpha male and dethrone him. A very similar hypothesis was defended by Freud (1913/1974).

They do not love us as a simple automatic return for our love, that is, simply because we love or desire them. They desire our attractive characteristics and not our person in itself. This is explained by the fact that their needs go far beyond mating: they need to raise and protect their offspring. Hence they do not miss males in themselves, but only their attitudes in utilitarian contexts. We, on the contrary, love them in themselves, that is, directly, because our existential goal is to mate. We want to pass on our genes against the genes of others. We love them bodily, directly. We are loved indirectly, in terms of function and usefulness. Our absence is not felt outside a utilitarian context.

The masculine existential goal is to mate, to impregnate, and to ensure the transmission of genetic inheritance against rival males. The feminine existential goal is the raising of offspring, which passes directly through the formation of the family. For us sex is an end, and for them it is a means, because the end is raising the young. In other words: feminine love is meant for the children and not for the males. Nietzsche states that the goal of women is pregnancy:

> “Everything in woman is a riddle, and everything has a single solution: it is called pregnancy.
> For woman, man is nothing but a means. The end is always the child. But what is woman to man?
>
> The man who is truly a man wants two things: danger and play. That is why he wants woman, the most dangerous plaything.
>
> Man should be educated for war and woman for the recreation of the warrior. All the rest is folly.
> The warrior does not like fruits that are too sweet. That is why he loves woman. The sweetest woman is still bitter.” (NIETZSCHE, 1884-1885/1985)

They want the best male in the herd, the best breeder and protector: the winner, the rich one, the famous one, the one who stands out from the other males. In this respect, they do not differ from female monkeys, wild mares, and other females. Just as among certain herds of mammals and flocks of birds the leading males are preferred by the females for mating and the second-rate males are rejected, among human groups the most outstanding are the most desired. Heartthrobs, artists, idols, etc. are chased and adored because they stand out and not for what they are in themselves. So if you want to attract the attention of some woman who ignores you, you must be different from the imbeciles. First of all, you must not do what everybody does: chase them, try to attract attention, talk a lot, talk loudly, clown around, rush to please, harass, pressure, etc. Learn to impress without making noise or effort, as if you did not want to. Be more feared than loved[5]. Impress her without fanfare, by paths contrary to those everyone treads. Approach without fear but with indifference, look her steadily in the eyes to intimidate[6] and then give some protective order, ignore attractive parts of her body on display, disagree, attack her mistaken points of view, startle her, "horrify her"[7] with your solid arguments, scandalize her, leave her emotionally defenseless[8], and surprise her by protecting her with indifference. Do not fear approaching or losing. Take risks. Know how to measure out your exposure to loss masterfully. Bind her[9]; make her think about you continually. Inhabit her thoughts and memories like a ghost,[10] as she does with you. Do not try to cross the barriers by the paths everybody tries; break into the fortress through the passages left unguarded because idiots do not notice them. Know how to perceive the moment to approach and to withdraw, to show disinterest and interest, to rebuff and to welcome. Do not become mechanized in a pattern as if you were a robot. Above all, be self-assured and love yourself.

What drives women crazy is the superiority of the male in every possible sense and field. They are attracted by signs of superiority: height, [5] On fear and love, see Machiavelli (1513/1977; 1513/2001) and Eliphas Lévi (1855/2001).

[6] In a healthy way. See the note on calculated "horrification."

[7] I am referring to calculated "horrification."

[8] I am referring only to the case in which this is justified as emotional self-defense, that is, when she tries to lower your self-esteem, ridicule you, scorn you, etc.

[9] Through her feelings, by making her like you. "Woman enchains thee through thy desires. Be master of thy desires and thou shalt enchain woman." (LÉVI, 1855/2001, p. 73) intelligence, money, etc., but above all by indifference, determination, and self-assurance. They reject signs of inferiority and weakness: short stature[11], poverty, stupidity[12], sentimentalism, romanticism, submission, harassment, flattery, adoration, doubt, wavering, insecurity, etc. They love superiority: female workers desire the owner of the company, female patients desire the doctor, female students desire the teacher, female fans desire the artist, short women desire tall men, and tall women desire even taller ones! German women desired Hitler and Russian women, Stalin (ALBERONI, 1986/n.d.). The greater the distance, the greater the desire, which explains the hysterical screams and fainting of women at concerts. The "inferior" ones[13] are rejected. Superiority is defined by the social context.

They will not take care to keep the male at their side if they feel secure. They will do so only before winning him or under the real threat of losing him. They hand over their treasures only in extreme situations. The love they offer in normal situations is garbage.

Feminine betrayals almost always begin with feeling, as something "innocent," and not with carnal desire, which for them is a complement and not the central ingredient of love. For this reason, it is very easy for them to defend themselves when we catch them in suspicious conduct, saying things like: "You have a dirty mind; the malice exists only in your head, etc." They tend to camouflage their affairs or flirtations as friendships and even to combine the two, which is why we must be alert and distrust the kindnesses, admiration, care, and attention they give to certain men they choose.

There is a specific personality, a special type of man whom women pursue: the cad[14], the one who has perfected the art of acting out being in love in order to convince, and who at the same time feels nothing. If the love is real, it will be uninteresting. The cad does not fall in love and at the same [11] Short stature seems to be read by women as a sign of male inferiority, unfortunately. This means that short men will have to compensate for this characteristic with others that exert an effect of attraction. Between two men who seem to her absolutely equal in everything, a woman will choose the taller one.

[12] I sometimes use "crude" terms because my target audience is adult heterosexual men. I have no reason to be delicate.

[13] In women's eyes, obviously.

[14] Cads are true emotional swindlers. Nessahan Alita does not approve of their conduct but has unfortunately observed that they are successful with women. Probably for unconscious reasons, women seem to have a special predilection for this type of man, a fact that harms them.

time embodies the feminine fantasy. He conveys the false impression of being understanding because he does not care what his partner does or whom she goes around with, since he has many others and does not want commitment. He seeks her out only for sex and then forgets her for a long time, making her swing between hope and despair. He does not flatter her; he is not clingy. He is distant and mysterious, since he needs to hide his life, his intentions, and what he does. He has all the ingredients of a perfect and unscrupulous lover, unfortunately.

Rich men, for their part, are preferred because they are few and not exactly because they are rich. There are rich wives who have poor lovers. Besides power, females want the prominence and emotional strength of their lover. They want to speak from below, looking up[15]. That is why you will be scorned if you are smaller than your partner in any sense. Be bigger and protective, but distant.

Material possessions, physical superiority, or any other attribute that society has agreed to treat as an indicator of high status confer self-assurance and make the male attractive. However, it is not the social attributes in themselves that are the factor of attraction, but rather the self-assurance they give to whoever has them.

A characteristic common to superior males, who dominate their females, is the capacity to lead the relationship and the initiative to make sound decisions. Inferior males tend to convey feebleness by consulting women excessively. They are guided by the mistaken idea that love will come in the form of gratitude for their having been good, helpful, submissive, etc. They believe that love is recognition, repayment. Poor wretches...

Feminine desire is double: for ardent and wild sex, the insensitive, promiscuous, bad, and cruel cads are chosen; for marriage, the good, faithful, honest, and hardworking men are sought. Hence the best part often goes to the good-for-nothings and the worst goes to the politically correct.

[15] This is what observation free of prejudice has revealed to me so far (and I am open to modifying this conception, provided it is proven to me). This being so, the man who speaks in a commanding tone is not emotionally attacking them but responding to a request.

Driven by the unconscious desire to keep as many males as possible desiring them, in order to create a matriarchal clan, females devise sophisticated psychological strategies to expose themselves to male desire without being held responsible. Roughly speaking, we can divide the males they seek into two types: the provider and the lover. They fight incessantly to subdue them all, and when they come across one who does not submit, he becomes a great emotional problem. Those who submit serve as providers, husbands, and those who do not submit serve as lovers, receiving tenderness, love, and good-quality sex.

The self-esteem of many women is defined by the number of males who desire and chase them. They need to feel desired (ALBERONI, 1986; NIETZSCHE, 1884-1885/1985), which is why they incessantly create mechanisms to expose themselves to desire and to dodge the fury of the males they have already conquered. They want to be chased so that they can rebuff the pursuer and tell everyone about it, drawing attention to their power to fascinate and attract. They are violently wounded in their feelings when they discover unequivocally that their sexual and affective favors are rejected. They need to assume continually that they will be chased. The inaccessible male becomes a problem and, at the same time, the object of greater efforts to seduce in order to subdue. Inaccessibility triggers attempts at seduction. The rejected female comes out of her inertia and mobilizes to turn the tables and take revenge, because she has been violently wounded in her self-love. Usually, most heterosexual females who, for some reason, are explicitly avoided by a man and notice it then attempt an approach, driven by the desire for revenge, by the need to raise their self-esteem, and by the need not to be “beneath” the other women who received his attention and kindness. They become terribly enraged and irritated because the unsatisfied desire to reject him and, at the same time, not to be rejected eats them alive inside[16].

Feminine tenderness is not a repayment or an automatic reflection of male love, but a strategy for conquest and imprisonment. That is why it is directed at those who do not love them. It is likewise diverted away from those who are in love and submissive. Tenderness, love, and dedication are tools of imprisonment. Hence, if you want to receive them uninterruptedly, you will have to keep yourself in an intermediate state, "one step away from submission," without ever really surrendering. Our mistake lies in believing the lie that tenderness and love are reflections of our most sublime feelings. The more we please them, the less of these we will receive.

[16] This unconscious tendency is extremely harmful to them, because it impels them to chase those who reject them and, at the same time, prevents them from feeling attracted to those who love and desire them. If the latter violently aroused feminine desire, the meeting of feelings, so dreamed of by humanity since the dawn of time, would be possible. However, I am unable to foresee what consequences this would have.

For your wife or girlfriend to stay faithful, she needs to feel you almost caught but continually inaccessible, and also to see you as unique and different from the others. If she actually catches you, she will set out to conquer another male superior to you.

The inaccessible male is an obstacle to the constant accumulative impulse that aims to increase the number of possible protectors and providers in stock. That is why the female lingers on him, trying to overcome him and remaining faithful as long as she is unable to subdue him.

The reason for the desire to accumulate protectors/providers is an unconscious need for security against possible future abandonment. In this sense, they do not feel the slightest scruple in using other people's feelings, because they do it unconsciously, vehemently denying such ruses to themselves or to anyone else.

The need to feel desired mobilizes them for the classic game of attracting and repelling, provoking and rejecting.

It may seem strange, but fear combined with admiration and protection forms a mixture that sets feminine desire on fire. Be feared, admirable, and protective. Do not misunderstand me: the fear I am referring to is the fear of loss, of being abandoned and traded in; it is also the fear of the weight of your decisions; it is not the fear of your physical strength, although that also counts[17]. Do not think I am suggesting violence against women or anything of the sort.

[17] To harm the relationship and make it worse.

Despite all the nonsense said to the contrary, our female friends, deep down, want the man to exercise dominance[18]. The dominant ones are those destined to receive their treasures, the erotic delights.

When one people invades and conquers the territory of another, dominating it, the females of the dominated people give themselves to the dominating people. They do so not only because they are forced to, as it seems at first sight, but also because they feel attracted to the males who hold power. This can be confirmed by observing, for example, how Brazilian women behave toward North American or European tourists. The reverse does not occur: the females of the dominant people do not feel very attracted to the males of the dominated people. Leaving aside special cases, the general tendency confirms my hypothesis.

Let us never forget that our delicious companions have a contradictory relationship with our phallus erectus: they fear it but at the same time need it in order to feel desired (they want to be desired because this guarantees them protection, raises their self-esteem, and makes their rivals envy them). From this contradiction derive all the absurd, disconcerting, and illogical [18] I am referring to the dominance of leadership, which converges with the woman's desires and needs, and not to physical or psychological coercion that runs counter to them. It is a leading, consented dominance, which leads her to feel protected and secure like a child. To make it clearer: a form of authorized dominance in which the man orders exactly what the woman needs and does so for her good. An attempt at coercive domination by the man legitimizes, on the woman's part, making his emotional life hell as a form of defense. The non-consented or selfish exercise of male power intensifies emotional dramas and makes the relationship worse. As for the consented exercise of power, it is what every democratic society enshrines (a couple is a form of society). The opposite of this would be anarchy. It is well known that all democratic human societies adopt the consented exercise of power and have hierarchies and authorities, which exercise the dominance that is theirs. A refusal by the authorities to exercise this dominance would constitute an omission that would provoke protests and even social chaos. It is in this sense that the Bible (I Corinthians 7:1–40; I Peter 3:3–7; and I Timothy 2:1–15) commands women to be subject to their husbands (and not in an oppressive sense, as the enemies of Christianity mistakenly interpret it) and provides for punishments for the husband's abuse of power. Power must be exercised correctly, with the common good in view (of society as a whole, of the family, or of the couple), by the one who leads. It is well known that, in popular slang, women label as "wimps" those who refuse to exercise the power that is theirs in a relationship, preferring to submit to and obey their partner. So they say, "So-and-so is a wimp, because he lets me boss him around however I like!" This labeling of submissive men as "wimps" reveals a demand for a dominant masculine stance. It is this mode of dominance that I am referring to in my books, and not coercive or oppressive dominance. It is a dominance exercised over the woman, through its effects, but before that it is exercised over the man's own psyche. Women are unanimous in stating that they hate being led, but they contradict themselves when they take actions that make the submissive man's life hell, demanding dominance and leadership, and when they show themselves violently attracted to leaders and, in general, to all men who stand out as the center of the social circle they belong to. It is much more comfortable and safe to be led than to lead. The risks and dangers of responsibility weigh much more on leaders than on those who are led, and this is one of the reasons why women demand male dominance and feel contempt for doormats. However, if the leadership is disastrous, the one who exercised it will be tormented to the brink of madness. It is a double burden: besides bearing the discomfort of leadership, the one who leads cannot make mistakes in dominating and leading.

behaviors in their relationships with us, as well as their natural propensity for hysteria and for the oscillation that leads them to attract only to run away and then rebuff. This makes feminine desire extremely difficult to understand, map, and describe, even for women themselves[19]. So never take what they say seriously. Except in exceptional cases, if you show yourself intensely interested, you will be rebuffed or avoided. There is a very clear objective in this: to intensify our passions and desires so as to induce us to chase and insist, making them feel desired and letting them enjoy the sensation of being "the hottest ones."

We are desired only to impregnate, to protect the female and her offspring, and to carry out dangerous, heavy, and difficult tasks. Sex as an act of pleasure is a simple repayment for this function. Outside these fields, we are not needed for anything else. Our absence will be felt only if we offer these benefits and take them away now and then, as punishment for some mistake. That is: your partner will bear your absence with immense ease and will feel no longing or lack of sex unless she finds herself exposed to some danger or difficulty. The man in love is not valued, because he is always available. The same goes for the harasser.

They greatly enjoy rejecting harassers[20]. Rejection is highly gratifying because it raises their self-esteem. That is why they lead us on, pretending to be interested, only to reject us sweetly afterward. When they cannot reject, that is, when nobody wants them anymore because they have become "ugly" (sic)[21], they become depressed. Rejecting instead of being rejected is one of the insane obsessions of the feminine unconscious.

Feminine desire is not what it appears to be at first sight; it has many nuances and contradictions. A very widespread mistake is the belief that we will be loved if we always do pleasant things. This is only part of the truth. Cads, for example, have their actions unanimously condemned by all women, [19] Here is further proof that the characteristics described here are unconscious.

[20] I am not referring to the psychopaths who harass without being provoked and consciously persist against the woman's evident wish to keep them away, but rather to the clumsy men who do so because they believe they are pleasing her or that they have some chance with the woman they desire. Generally, such confusion occurs for two reasons: a) the harasser misinterprets the signals sent by feminine behavior; b) the woman sends, on purpose or not, signals indicating that she is interested, which thus keep the poor wretch's hopes alive.

[21] Society has unfortunately agreed that women lose their beauty as they grow older, and to this day it refuses to relativize beauty.

yet they are loved; they swim in harems. What is going on? Simple: the actions are condemned, while those who take them are loved more and more precisely because they have the courage to defy general approval, including women's. The actions of the cad, and also of the mature and genuine man, have various implications for the feminine unconscious. Do not be guided only by what people say and openly admit.

The feminine unconscious does not see male kindness as something noble that should be repaid with faithful love. It takes it as a symptom of weakness that must be exploited to obtain personal benefits, and nothing beyond that. That is why submissive flatterers get cuckolded: they are good for nothing but working, providing, and wearing horns. By taking on a passive role in the relationship, they communicate that they are inferior specimens[22] of the species, carriers of the worst genes, and therefore unsuitable for mating. Consequently, females feel no sexual excitement for them. When submissive men marry, they receive only a rationed amount of erotic favors, the minimum needed to keep them from rebelling against their training.

We often see them enraptured reading sappy romance novels, and so we believe that romantic men correspond to the masculine ideal they carry in their soul and to which they ardently wish to surrender. This is a mistake: the romantic man is an emotional slave who gives love without receiving it and who does not complete them. When reading these novels, the readers put themselves in the role of the plain, simple young heroine who conquers and subdues through love the hero who stands at the top of the male hierarchy. It is curious to note that in such novels the hero in love satisfies all the young heroine's absurd[23] dreams but does not have his own dreams satisfied, because he is a mere servant. The readers imagine themselves receiving love and not giving it, as it sometimes seems. There is as much perversity and cruelty in this as in male pornography, because the peculiarities of the opposite sex are violated. The tenderness and sex that the heroes of romantic tales receive are minimal, and the love is sexless or only slightly sexual. There is no pornography. Rose-tinted tales are tales of feminine victories in the battle of love. They are "epics" in this sense.

[22] This is a manifestation of the process of natural selection described by Darwin.
[23] For the unconscious does not follow what we have agreed to call logic.

The other half of the problem does not appear in romantic tales because it is unconscious, and it is precisely the half we are interested in knowing: the stories in which we win the battles. The part of our soul that wins them is cold, implacable, cruel, decisive, self-assured, objective, and yet protective. This is the face that dominates them.

There are two forms of coldness and dominance: the protective one and the exploitative-oppressive one. The first benefits them and is desired because it meets woman's biological and social needs. The second frightens them and provokes hatred and revulsion. We abused the second form in the past[24], and today we suffer the terrible consequences. We are hated because, when we had power in our hands, we used it the wrong way. All that is left for us now is to correct the mistake.

Take command of her[25] in order to protect her; take charge.

The need to be protected is linked to the need to feel close to a superior male who inspires a little fear in them[26]. They like to look up, and they want to be taken into the territory of some powerful stallion. Ladies with great power of command, who obey no one, whom everyone serves and hastens to please (queens, princesses, great businesswomen, etc.), tend to be depressed because this need goes unfulfilled.

When ladies state that they want good, sensitive, romantic, honest, hardworking, and sentimental men, they are telling the truth, but only partially, because they do not reveal what they want them for. And what do they desire them for? To serve them while they give their heart, soul, and sex to the insensitive men and the cads. The good men are desired as [24] This was the mistake of extremist male chauvinism. In making it, it provided more than enough reasons for women's rebellion. The result of the evolution of this process of abuse of power was the birth of feminism.

[25] To avoid any confusion, let us distinguish completely between mastery and domination. In this book, we suggest to the man only mastery of himself, of the situation involving both partners, of the relationship, and, when requested and consented to, of the woman (in the purely romantic sense of the word and in no other—I am totally opposed to the domination of another's mind for any purpose whatsoever). This idea of mastery (and not of domination) has stirred up much controversy. The consented mastery discussed here is in fact the natural result of renouncing coercive domination. Coercive domination is oppressive. When we renounce coercive domination completely and truly, a feeling of vulnerability (lack of protection) develops in the woman that leads her to request, unconsciously, dominant masculine stances. This request is expressed in the form of provocative, challenging, and irritating behaviors. This seems to be related to the Electra complex or, at least, to be linked in some way to the father question.

[26] As happened when she was a child, in relation to her father. Again the same complex.

providing beasts of burden who ensure the raising of offspring, but never as breeders. The breeding function falls to the bad men, unfortunately, because they communicate that they carry the best genes in terms of animal survival, since they do not seek anyone's love in order to be happy[27]. This explains why villains, mobsters, celebrities, and unscrupulous and powerful businessmen have so many beautiful women. It also explains why good husbands usually receive only a minimum in sexual terms, and why wives do not feel great passions or excitement for them.

When it comes to discovering feminine desires in order to succeed in conquest, there are many lies, confusions, and traps. A very well-known trap is the idea that we must make them laugh so that they will give themselves to us and love us. According to this absurd theory, those who make them laugh would be the favorites. I will now unmask this much-touted lie.

Ladies really do tend to pay special attention to funny guys who make them laugh, and this can be a good way to approach them, but if you limit yourself to that, you will be just a clown. She will use you as a comedian who does not charge for his work, and she will not pay a cent. Since they very much like to take advantage of suckers, exploiting them to get favors for free, they use the poor little jokers to relieve their bouts of sadness and depression, which arise from hormonal fluctuations. Free clowns are used and exploited by the sly ones in the same way as other kinds of suckers, such as those fools who rush to send flowers, buy drinks, give presents, carry shopping bags, offer them their seat on public transportation, etc., without receiving anything in return, much less sex. It may be good to play the imbecile in order to approach, but once you have made contact, you need to change your conduct to go further, or you will end up sucking your own thumb, not to say something else... To be loved, it is necessary not only to make them laugh now and then but also, and perhaps above all, to make them cry fairly often.

The apparent contradiction inherent in feminine desire, which is in truth merely the concealment of its most important facet, is the main factor that leaves us so confused and lost. The problem lies in us, in our mistaken view of the opposite sex, and not in them. The absurd beliefs we carry, inculcated since childhood, make women seem incomprehensible, inconsistent, and absurd in our eyes, but in reality the feminine psyche follows a logic (completely different from the one we imagine) and is entirely comprehensible. Ladies are not as incomprehensible as they want, often on purpose, to seem.[28]

[27] This is an ancestral reminiscence of the hominid primates, among whom the most powerful and intelligent at facing the hostile, wild world was the best protector (DOBZHANSKY, 1968). I suspect that civilized life has inverted the meaning of the feminine selective criterion, or put it out of tune.

6. Psychological tortures

Sly females will "torment" (provoke and irritate)[1] the males who do not know how to exercise dominance[2] by means of a protective coldness, a powerful will, and an extreme severity[3]. They take great satisfaction in creating puzzles and emotional games; they delight in watching us suffer as we try to dismantle them. When they see us in a tight spot, desperate to get out of the psychological plots they create, they are happy and can measure our persistence in order to assess how far they have managed to fascinate us, for they seek the one-sided continuation of the romantic encounter. Always keep reason on your side so as not to fall headfirst into the abyss.

The refinement of this ability to wound emotionally begins at the start of adolescence, when girls tend to replace physical aggression with words:

> "At thirteen, a revealing difference between the sexes appears: girls become more capable than boys of planning cunning aggressive tactics, such as isolating others, gossiping, and taking sly little revenges. Boys, in general, remain brawlers, unaware of the use of subtler strategies. This is just one of the many ways in which boys—and, later, men—are less sophisticated than the opposite sex in the byways of emotional life." (GOLEMAN, 1997, p. 145)

[28] There is an apparent illogicality and a real illogicality. Both may or may not be unconscious and intentional. There are cases in which the woman only wants to seem illogical without actually being so, but she is not conscious of this desire. In this case, the illogicality serves a deeper logical goal. There are other cases in which she really is illogical. This latter case results from contradictory and mutually exclusive desires. But in both cases there may be varying residues of consciousness. We can know nothing about another person's immediate consciousness.

[1] These "tortures" are one of the expressions of the sadistic love described by Fromm (1976).

[2] I mean the emotional dominance that results naturally from the masculine renunciation of every form of coercive domination.

[3] I mean the severity that a man must exercise over himself in order to educate his will.

Woman's emotional intelligence is more developed than man's, because she is encouraged from childhood to face and talk about her emotions (GOLEMAN, 1997). This gives them a sophisticated ability to strike at our feelings, for good as well as for ill. An example of the bad use of this form of intelligence can be seen when a woman discovers that a man she previously considered special is in truth just an ordinary mortal. She then becomes disenchanted and loses interest. Disillusioned, she begins to detest him and torment him psychologically (ALBERONI, 1986/n.d.):

> "She is then seized by irritation, by anger. She escapes into fantasies. At the same time, she takes revenge with routine gestures that irritate the man and leave him exasperated. Knowing his tastes and desires, she strikes at him continuously, obsessively. It is a ritual of hatred, to which she devotes herself with the same diligence she once devoted to the ritual of love" (p. 78)

Therefore, feminine fragility is undeniable in the physical sphere but not in the emotional sphere as a whole (CREVELD, 2004), contrary to the widespread belief in popular culture. In the field of the couple's relationship, many human females are not the least bit delicate or fragile; they are powerful, merciless, and they play dirty[4]. However, we must accept such characteristics as instinctive and natural, without rebelling.

They possess great magnetic power (LÉVI, 1855/2001) to provoke negative feelings in the male. If he is emotionally weak, they easily make him fall into states of jealousy, irritation, and impatience (JUNG, 1996) and, in the same way, they make him feel small, as if he were a brat (ALBERONI, 1986/n.d.). These influences are actions of the animus, the masculine part of the feminine unconscious, upon the anima, which is the feminine part of the masculine unconscious (JUNG, 1979; JUNG, 1995). You must have seen those funny situations in which women in a group laugh at a lone man to make him feel small (ALBERONI, 1986/n.d.). If he is not emotionally strong enough to return the magnetic flow, he will momentarily regress to childhood. I love to dismantle this sentimental manipulation simply by giving them back a sarcastic smile while I stare them in the eyes for a long time, until they become intrigued about my motives and start bombarding me with questions. Then I withdraw without answering, victorious.

Because they are psychological, feminine strategies of attack and retaliation are rarely admitted. They hide very well from ordinary eyes, which can only see the external, the physical. Nevertheless, they are highly effective at inducing suffering in others.

The secret to defending ourselves against all the female wiles of manipulation and mental/emotional torture consists in not identifying ourselves with the woman's strategies, isolating her in her own capricious and contradictory acts. For this, it is indispensable not to be in love, which can be achieved only through the death of the egos. Then she will play her games alone and drink in all the madness she tried to introduce into our heart. Such power is attained when we break with identification through the strong work of eliminating sentimentalism. It is also advisable to regard her as a "tramp"[5] until proven otherwise, since in our modern Western civilization, with its "advanced" customs, few escape. There are sly ones who pretend to be "little saints" for several years.

The capacity to resist feminine bewitchments and enchantments is one of the prerequisites of mythic heroes, who resist fears and attractions, not allowing desires and fears to steal their soul and cloud their consciousness. As a simple matter of spiritual health and emotional survival, man must reconcile himself with the masculine patterns portrayed in myths (JUDY, 1998). Once we have achieved such independence, we must observe the female, waiting to find out how long she will persist in her attempts to bewitch and subjugate us. We have to hand back to her the burden she insistently tries to throw onto our backs, that is, let her do all the heavy work and simply wait until exhaustion overtakes her.

A very common way of torturing is through suspicious behavior that provokes jealousy. The stages of this process of mental torture are the following:

[5] In the sense given by the Michaelis (1995) and Aurélio (FERREIRA, 1995) dictionaries.

1st phase—The woman behaves like a saint, giving affection and sex until we are emotionally dependent. In this phase she pretends not to be interested in anyone else, not to give attention or the time of day to any other man.

2nd phase—After making sure that we have taken the bait and are firmly caught by feeling, the "tramp[6]" begins to behave suspiciously toward other males, so as to cast doubts into our mind and set off suffering from jealousy.

3rd phase—When we protest, with just cause, she flatly denies the intentions behind such visibly compromising behavior, claiming innocence, indignation, sadness, etc., crying crocodile tears and persisting in the same behavior right afterward.

Through this strategy, the female manages to prolong the male's suffering indefinitely. They use it with greater or lesser intensity, according to their conceptions of the world and the willingness they have to fight against their own evil instincts. Note that the foundation of the torture is the feeling of attachment and passion. Despite all your attempts to break free and your useless thrashing about, she will not stop torturing you with such games unless she feels that you have truly fallen out of love. This is the secret. The more in love you are, the more subjected to the infernal little games you will be.

Try acting intensely jealous and needy on the phone: your partner will make up some pretext or other and hang up right away to keep you in that state for the next few days. The thing is, they like to see us like that, desperate, because it gives them a morbid pleasure associated with the feeling that there is a sucker who will wait for them all his life. However, this kind of pleasure does not fulfill them as women, and you will be regarded as a secondary and uninteresting male if you show yourself this way, a mere spare kept in reserve as a last resort. The first on the list will be the one who does not pay them much attention, without letting himself become polarized in coldness. If you have made this mistake of being jealous, to correct it you need to undo the belief that was created. This feminine behavioral pattern of pulling away when the male is jealous or needy can also be very useful when you are fed up and want some peace for a few days: just stage a scene like that and you will be left in peace. But do not forget: if, as the days go by, you do not confirm with additional signs the belief you induced, your companion will come desperately after you.

Another common way of making our mind a hell is to make dates and not show up. To smash this little game, never forget to set a limit on the times of the dates, and never stay waiting like an idiot after the deadline has passed. Deadlines disconcert them because they are agreements explicitly defined for both parties, which corner their minds and prevent them from maneuvering in vagueness.

There is also an ingenious feminine strategy that consists in not showing care and withholding affection in order to induce the male to show them.

In practically all torturing psychological games we will find vagueness and contradictions intended to confuse. We see them, for example, in the woman who flirts and then runs away, in the one who starts an argument by raising critical points and slips away before they are cleared up, in the one who takes the initiative of calling and then behaves as if she wanted to hang up quickly, etc. The intention is to leave important questions hanging in the air, feelings unresolved.

In short, the mechanisms of torture consist in stirring up our doubt, our sexual drive, and our amorous feelings to the utmost but never satisfying them. When they decide to satisfy them, they do so because they feel threatened[7], moved by the idea that they are losing dominance, but keeping the expectation that further on they will be able to throw us into prolonged dissatisfaction again. Erotic desire and the feeling of love (understood here as being in love and attachment) are normally the main tools used, the others being rarely employed except in direct association with these or in exceptional cases. Unsatisfied arousal produces a state of discomfort that can be prolonged to the utmost. This is why real hatred, rejection, or indifference on the man's part frightens them: it renders them powerless. Hatred is not advisable[8]. Indifference[9] is, and it can be attained when we eliminate all the egos related to passion, attachment, lust, affection, etc.

As a means of defense, it may be advisable to unmask the little games now and then. But this must be done at the exact moment they are happening and in a way that corners her and allows no evasion. The best way of unmasking I have found is simply to point them out with conviction at the very instant they are being applied, so as to take her by surprise and allow no denial. Your inattention will be used against you. Therefore, be alert to catch and denounce, mercilessly, cruelly[10], and implacably[11], all wiles, lies, and manipulations. The fundamental thing is to be alert, ready to unmask with lightning speed. If the denunciation is postponed, it will turn into a mere argument and the opportunity will have been lost. Never leave the unmasking for later, because it will not have the same effect, owing to the feminine wiles for evading the problems of the romantic relationship. The problem here lies in the fact that we are slow, because we are more rational, while our lady friends are fast because they move and are motivated only by feelings[12]. To overcome this deficiency in speed, all we need to do is get used to expecting the worst[13]. In this way, we will be one step ahead, early in perceiving the wiles of others.

Normally, the little games are inhibited when we let them know we are expecting them. As long as our companions feel that we are waiting for their tricks, they avoid using them.

[8] I make a point of underlining this recommendation. Hatred is the origin of countless psychopathologies, and those who cultivate it, regardless of whether or not they are in the right, condemn themselves to live hell in their soul. The nervous system and the immune system influence each other (GOLEMAN, 1997), which causes negative emotions, such as hatred, to alter the quality and intensity of the body's resistance, provoking illnesses. A study in the United Kingdom revealed that romantic disappointments increase the rate of heart disease (BUSTV, 2007)

[9] In cases where this is justified by the other person's attempt to toy with our feelings.

[10] That is, without letting oneself be dissuaded by sentimental manipulations.

[11] Which is much nobler and not cowardly like the act of attacking.

[12] Emotional intelligence is much faster than intellectual intelligence, and women surpass men in this field. The intellect is sluggish, a latecomer. Logos is a predominant function in man and Eros the predominant function in woman (JUNG, 2002).

[13] Put another way, perhaps more accurately, we could say: expect everything, both as regards good and as regards evil, or else expect nothing, which is almost the same thing. Aggressiveness is a natural unconscious human function (FREUD, 1913/1974) in its various modalities. All human beings attack, even if they do not know it or do not accept it.

The psychological suffering of the human being, whether man or woman, is something real but not punishable. It is not punishable because we underestimate the psychic aspect of life, considering it "subjective." This means that the act of tormenting one's neighbor emotionally is not considered a crime from the legal point of view[14], a fact that greatly favors them, since we cannot report them for romantic tortures. The continual use of these tortures is due, in part, to the ancestral hatred they have against us[15] and, in part, to the need to test us.

Watch a circle of women and you will see them condemning, ridiculing, and satirizing the masculine, never extolling it. You will never see them praising the importance we have or admitting their dependence on our protection. One concludes, therefore, that our manipulators suffer unconsciously from hatred and envy, not accepting their natural condition, which is different from the masculine one, and that they feel a sadistic pleasure in tormenting us, a more than fair reason for us to defend ourselves by eliminating our inner weaknesses and to teach them a few little lessons.

7. Getting past the emotional defenses of women who are closed to approach and contact

Just as we are vulnerable to erotic assaults by femmes fatales, many women have no resistance whatsoever against a disinterested protective command without sexual intentions, because they are looking for suckers ready to serve them for all eternity. This selfish impulse, however, can be used in our favor, for it is an open flank. Human females are not as invulnerable as they appear to the men who, at first sight, seem uninteresting to them.

When the female is absolutely refractory to contact and approach, it is generally because she believes she is exceedingly desired, or else she wants to induce men to believe it so that they will desire her. Consequently, the more blatantly we display our sexual intention, the more we will close the passage. The more you look at her covetously, make advances, and insist, the more you will be rebuffed. The only alternative left for conquering her is to [14] This is no longer true today in some countries. However, the laws still do not recognize emotional violence in love perpetrated by women against men, but only by men against women. It is a reflection of the widespread prejudice against the masculine gender (CREVELD, 2004).

[15] Which is closely related to the Penis envy complex (Freud).

show yourself in the opposite way, acting as if you could desire every woman in the world except her! If, instead of pretending, you manage to let go and really see her as a normal woman, equal to or even less interesting than the others, so much the better.

I will now set out this feminine weakness in the field of seduction more fully; obviously, I am thinking of absolutely "difficult" women, because the "easy" ones require no work. Difficult women are those who are absolutely refractory, with whom one cannot establish any sympathetic affinity in order to conquer them. They tend to be scowling, and nobody has the courage to come near them or even to look at them. They can also be those beauties who frighten even the most macho of men.[1]

Let us see what happens. Given the double meaning attributed to sex, when faced with masculine desire females envision two possibilities: one that they desire and another against which they feel an instinctive horror. The possibility they desire is that of being loved, and the one they detest is that of being violated (ALBERONI, 1986/n.d.). This latter is what makes them so prone to hysteria. It is the unconscious fear of being violated that leads them to reject the losers, those incapable of seducing them, the shy ones, the clingy ones, the childish ones, and, in general, every harasser or pursuer (ALBERONI, 1986/n.d.). This contradiction makes them disconcerting, for they fear and desire at the same time (ALBERONI, 1986/n.d.). The contradiction of feelings, inherent in the contradiction of the possible consequences of masculine desire, leads them to act in a paradoxical way that does not allow us to know what they really want. The slightest suspicion of any intention of sexual violence can trigger a hysterical crisis that will give rise to a hostile social chain against the harasser. No amount of care is too much to avoid being mistaken for a loser, and therein lies the problem, for we have to approach them, make contact, and conquer them without harassing[2]. Hence the importance of knowing how to read the signals correctly, of never insisting against resistance, of knowing how to approach with a certain dose of hypocrisy (LÉVI, 1855/2001)[3], without conveying that we are desperate,

[1] I mean the arrogant and snobbish ones, not the humble, kind, and sincere ones.
[2] And without doing violence to their emotions.
[3] This refers to a healthy form of hypocrisy, popularly known as having a "brazen face."

and of never forcing absolutely anything. We have to go through only the passages that are opened to us. But the passages will not be opened unless we conceal our desire. Explicit masculine desire causes fear, aversion, and disgust (ALBERONI, 1986/n.d.), contrary to what the ignorant think. It is repulsive. That is why, if you show your penis in public, you will go to jail immediately, whereas your neighbor, if she takes off her clothes in the middle of downtown, will merely be taken tenderly to the doctor[4]. Explicit masculine desire closes the passage to intimacy.

In the feminine mind there is a constant opening, a passage that never closes. A skilled seducer quickly identifies it and uses it. It is the opening to intimacy "without malice" with a man who convinces her that he is disinterested, without ulterior motives, without sexual aims, but at the same time protective and dominant. Paradoxically, the more we conceal our sexual intention, the more opening to an "innocent" intimacy we obtain. That is why you should be suspicious of your wife's innocent little friends.

The key to approaching the scowling ones consists in gradually increasing intimacy while at the same time showing indifference, naturalness, and lack of interest, combined with a slightly protective and aggressive posture. Depending on the degree of resistance and antipathy of our "prey"[5], we need to feign indifference not only toward sex but even toward friendship and toward the lady's very person.

Gynecologists, for example, are permitted to look inside vaginas simply because they are backed by the belief that their aims are merely therapeutic. The woman who opens her legs for him does so out of an unshakable belief in his honesty and absence of sexual interest. Along the same line, but going further, the gynecologist can touch her clitoris[6] on the pretext of performing an examination, and even arouse her. As long as the belief is preserved, there will be no feminine reaction against the touch, in the sense of rejecting it. In the nineteenth century, doctors even went so far as to arouse and masturbate women as a form of treatment to try to cure them of frigidity. That is how the vibrator was invented: as a medical tool to replace the hands. Obviously, many were not cured in a single session; others discovered that they felt nothing when they were at home with their husband, but only with the doctor, and returned to the office many times... This is proof that the belief in, and trust in, the absence of sexual intentions allows a woman to open up and give herself little by little. The same happens with psychotherapists, to whom they reveal secrets they would never reveal to anyone, much less to their husbands. Deep down, females want to feel welcomed, understood, and accepted just as they are, without any sexual favor being demanded in return. They want to feel safe, to have a harbor where they can dock.

[5] This is a metaphorical expression.
[6] I believe this is what Nelson Rodrigues was referring to in his sayings about gynecologists.

Our lady friends will run away if you are lustful and blatantly display your intention. To approach them without their running away or rebuffing us, we have to show ourselves uninterested in their erotic attributes and, at the same time, tighten the bonds of intimacy, giving protection and orders[7], guiding them, and also listening to them or helping them. Sometimes, to disarm them, it is necessary to reprimand them, making it explicit that we do so for their own good, and, in some extreme cases, even to reject her approach or presence, wounding her emotionally[8].

It is not a matter of being the little confidant friend or the sexless nice guy who desires no one. What I am suggesting here is something entirely different. It is a matter of being a superior male who does not desire her in particular, because he has the chance to get other, better ones, but who reveals himself as a real man in the way he treats her, without fear, without desperation to please, and without fear of losing.

Note that I am not claiming that friendship is a good path to seduction, as my opponents pretended to understand. What I am claiming is that women withdraw when we blatantly display our desire and open up when they believe we have no desire for them at all. None of this means that women feel attraction to friends or that friendship is an efficient means of seduction. What happens is that they offer their treasure to those who do not want it and refuse it to those who desire it. I am claiming that blatant intention scares them away and indifference attracts.

[7] I mean the dominance consented to and requested by the woman herself.
[8] I mean legitimate emotional defense.

The need to be accepted with their "morally reprehensible acts"[9] is very strong and makes them vulnerable to men who show no sexual ulterior motives and do not react with disapproval to the mistakes they make. When they get to know such a man, they gradually reveal to him the "ugliest" or most "wrong" things they have ever done in their lives, observing his reactions. As they confirm that they are accepted, or rather, that these men are morally indifferent, they build more trust, and the confessions deepen as intimacy grows. Then, without realizing it, they are already involved emotionally and sexually.

This is the mental passage that never closes and through which any woman can be conquered, provided we treat her correctly. There is no heterosexual woman who can resist correct advances through this channel, because all of them have a desperate need for complicity and for raising their self-esteem when they do not feel desired. If one still resists, it will be due to some clumsiness on the part of the would-be seducer that resulted in some subliminal communication of intention.

Women are also absolutely vulnerable to friendships, and when they rebuff a friendly attempt at contact, it is because they perceive that the candidate for "friend without malice" wants something more. And they perceive it because he shows himself to be a needy male and, therefore, a second-rate one. Those who avoid contact and behave in an inaccessible way do not do so out of respect or love for the man they live with or are committed to, but because they hold no hope that there are sincere friendly intentions on the part of those who cross their path and try to approach them. It happens that, in the case of the scowling ones, this is the only possible route of approach left, apart from calculated "horrification," which should be understood as the act of scandalizing and shocking in the right way (and harmlessly, obviously), a resource that is not advisable to use very often, but only when all the others have failed.

The ability to conceal one's true intention confers an irresistible power of approach. I suggest, however, not that we conceal ulterior motives, but that we not have them[10], for the ideal is to reach a state of indifference as to whether or not we are accepted.

Once the ability to show specific lack of interest perfectly and for a long time has been acquired, the difficulty will then lie in crossing the limits of intimacy and entering deeply into the feminine world. This is a form of psychological penetration that is obtained by talking disinterestedly with the woman about herself, making her feel welcomed and safe.

The course of the conversations should revolve around general romantic questions and, later, around the specific romantic questions of the woman we are seducing. The sexual theme can be introduced only after a good while.

The more intense the displays of disinterested, dominant, guiding, and protective care, the more emotionally intoxicated she will become[11].

Knowing this, human females take special care not to be deceived and never believe in our lack of interest right at first sight. Some go so far as to hold out for a long time, checking what our intentions are. An exclusively sexual intention is seen as aggressive and uninteresting.

Feminine emotional defenses are crossed through attitudes that communicate indifference, specific sexual lack of interest in the "prey," and, at the same time, guidance, command, and protection. The image to project is more or less that of someone sexually uninterested in the woman he commands, but not asexual in general (be careful!). There can be no hesitation, wavering, or doubt in how you treat her. By this path one enters the world of even the most forbidden and difficult women. There are men who have seduced unthinkable women with this procedure alone.

8. Why we should neither argue nor debate

Women tend to have many attitudes that harm their relationship with us. Among such attitudes, I can mention a taste for male friendships, the habit of admiring or praising other men, famous or not, etc. When we catch them red-

[10] For in this way we will be more genuine [11] All of this must be genuine and not feigned. Do not use this knowledge for evil.

handed, they flatly deny it and say it was all something innocent and without bad intentions, "nothing malicious."

Because they are based on feelings and not on reason, these undesirable feminine ideas and behaviors remain unscathed after we have intellectually destroyed their arguments.

In general, feminine arguments in favor of the attitudes that destroy the relationship are very flimsy. However, there is no point in arguing or debating, for even after they have been destroyed, their motives prevail because they are emotional. They then work out other psychological paths to justify their shady attitudes without ever owning up to them.

For these reasons, it is a total waste of time to argue or debate when we catch them in crooked tricks[1]. This habit, which I see in many men, only creates an unpleasant atmosphere in the relationship and drives us mad, to feminine delight[2].

Instead of debating, it is better to take a radical and unexpected attitude that corners her and leaves her disconcerted about us. A very disconcerting attitude that works well is simply to accept the contrary and undesirable opinion. Accepting certain absurd opinions about fidelity, however, is very difficult in certain cases because it demands total freedom from passion. Experience has shown me that when we seriously encourage a woman who

[1] The more a man tries to do violence to his companion's free will, in the vain attempt to force her to change her behavior or admit her mistakes, the more strength he will be giving her. He will open himself to being accused of coercion, emotional violence, dictatorial behavior, etc. He will lose the moral high ground and be seen as a monster by himself, by the sly one, and by everyone who witnesses the conflict. As Esther Vilar (1972) wrote: "woman has the power that man gives her." (my trans.). For this and other reasons, granting the woman total freedom is much more advisable from the standpoint of emotional defense. The most advisable course is for the man to leave her absolutely free to do whatever she wants, never forbidding anything, but handing back to her all the consequences and responsibilities that are hers. This demands total freedom from passion and total adaptability or, at least, at levels higher than those that correspond to the ordinary man, violent, passionate, and uncontrolled.

[2] Regarding this detail, Goleman (1997) tells us that women become distressed when men shut down, refusing to take part in conflictual debates, and that they calm down when men do take part. Still according to Goleman, men shut down as a defense mechanism against emotional flooding. When a man shuts down in a conflict situation, his heartbeat calms down but his wife's speeds up. When he opens up to the argument, the wife's heartbeat calms down and his speeds up. Thus an oscillating game of transmitting distress from one side to the other is formed. Therefore, the woman needs masculine participation in the conflict so that her heartbeat does not speed up. If she feels blocked, boycotted by the man who refuses to continue the conflict, she will be flooded by feelings of powerlessness, frustration, anger, etc. (GOLEMAN, 1997). Conclusion: they like to watch the circle catch fire and to know that we are going crazy. Let us deny them this morbid pleasure.

is flirting with another guy to go off with him, she becomes desperate if she was only trying to irritate us. This is a good form of revenge because, most of the time, the other one does not want her seriously, leaving her alone in the end, with no one, and we will be able to laugh. On the other hand, if the guy really wants her and accepts her, and she wants him too, this will only mean that you should have treated her as a "tramp[3]" from the start, and that, if you considered her your girlfriend, the mistake was yours alone for not having perceived what kind of person you had at your side.

This is the attitude least expected from a man and, precisely for that reason, the most disconcerting. In general, what is expected is that in such situations we will protest and fall into emotional upsets of various kinds. If, on the contrary, we encourage them to carry the absurd fantasy forward, they will be emotionally cornered[4].

However, so as not to be predictable, it is advisable now and then to go to the opposite extreme, implacably unmasking their disguises (without arguing, but only making confident, clear, direct, and conclusive observations) without the slightest fear of losing her and without wavering. For the unmasking to reach the feelings and have the desired effect, the words used must be extremely easy to understand, suited to little rational intelligence[5], and at the same time absolutely exact, in order to bring about an unerring cornering. Be prepared, because in these cases feminine reactions tend to be violent, and you will need to be forewarned in order to hold things together with a female in a fit of madness for having been unmasked by force and suddenly feeling naked. But this will soon pass if you are the stronger and colder of the two and remain centered. Do not fear clamor, shouting, or

[3] In the sense given by the Michaelis (1995) and Aurélio (FERREIRA, 1995) dictionaries.

[4] All the forms of psychological cornering described in this work have only the effect of leading the woman of ambiguous behavior to reveal what she truly feels for us and her real intentions, and they are totally ineffective as a form of manipulation aimed at satisfying the man's personal desires. Those who try to use them for this shady purpose will suffer the consequences of the shot that backfires and will land in ridiculous situations. They will be caught on their own hook and will unknowingly drink the poison they distilled. Since this is counter-manipulation (the dismantling of manipulative wiles) and not manipulation, its effectiveness is borne out only in cases of legitimate emotional defense, in which reason is on our side. In other cases it is ineffective, since woman is more skilled at manipulating feelings than man. Trying to outdo woman in the manipulative wiles of love is almost the same as demanding that they outdo us in physical strength, that is, an absurdity.

[5] For discernment disappears in moments of flooding by negative emotions. This holds for both sexes. Trying to reason with a person who is possessed by negative feelings is a waste of time.

crying. Do not be affected by storms of words. Stand firm and resolute in your position. The flow of energy you set off will soon be exhausted.

When faced with shady attitudes on your companion's part that cast doubt on her fidelity, do not waste time arguing, but simply communicate, without wavering, what such acts mean to you and the consequences they will have. Do not try to negotiate or make her understand your point of view, because it will be useless, and on top of that you will be considered weak and unsure about your own goals in life. In general, a second chance can be given, provided the lapse was not serious.

In matters of behavior that shakes our belief in fidelity, a very common mistake is to insist that our dear ones acknowledge their shady attitudes. We do it in the vain hope that they may understand our noble motives, expecting our point of view to be taken into account. This has the opposite effect and causes us to be seen as weak rather than democratic. On the other hand, we are seen as strong and resolute when we corner them by communicating unilaterally what we perceive and the measures we will take as a consequence, refusing to argue. However, if you bluff, promising a "punishment"[6] without carrying it out, you are lost. Promise only what you can carry out.

What matters is to close all the exits. The door to stubbornness and resistance stays open when we argue. Render stubbornness useless by giving free rein to opinions contrary to yours. Regard other people's mistaken opinions as a problem that is not yours[7] but belongs to the very person who voices and defends them (and so do the consequences).

Obviously, you should not try to do this if you are in love, or you will fall headfirst into the abyss. The man in love is in a servile and miserable state, incapable of mastering the relationship. That is why women insistently try to induce us to surrender.

[6] By "punishment," understand the breaking off of the relationship or, at least, of the man's commitment to fidelity.

[7] According to Freire (2000), the mature man accepts opinions contrary to his own and does not try to do violence to the other's point of view; the capacity to accept divergence corresponds to the fourth stage in the maturing of consciousness.

Do not try to force her to be coherent, sensible, or logical. Accept her as she is, understand her, and adapt. Have no form; kill your egos. Observe her and take things as they are, without wishing they were different.

Our adorable companions are naturally conditioned to concealment, and that is why they are sometimes such liars[8]. They do very well in roles that require the ability to hide, to dissemble. They need to feel that they are deceiving, and when they cannot hide anything from us, they become sad and depressed, feeling incompetent[9]. But so it must be; let us not rebel. We have to adapt to their ambiguous languages, learning to find our way amid the chaos they create, instead of fighting, arguing, and debating.

The time and effort spent on arguments are lost, because we cannot reach them ahead of the facts. We reach them only with real facts in progress and never with warnings, alerts, pleas, etc. There are no emotional impacts[10] a priori, only a posteriori.

The only case in which an argument can be considered useful is when it is taken as an opportunity for our psychological training. We can develop resistance if we gradually expose ourselves to the deleterious hypnotic influences of the formidable and fatal feminine magnetism. In an argument[11], the battle does not take place on the rational plane, as it seems at first sight, but on the emotional plane. Be much colder, more incisive, more direct, more aggressive[12], more curt, and blunter than your opponent in order to exercise dominance[13], or you will be the one dominated. Do not argue: communicate, running over, trampling, and crushing every fascinating influence[14]. Look her

[8] I thus return the provocations of the authors who characterize the masculine gender as inherently mendacious.

[9] Although they are not always aware of it. This anguish gestates at deep levels of the psyche and becomes visible in the form of feelings of vulnerability. It seems to me that the act of concealing gives them a sense of security, as if they were sheltered from something they fear. Most likely this fear of the masculine is the fear of the father figure pointed out so many times by Freud in his works.

[10] These impacts should not be understood as harm, much less as aggression, but as sensitizations that mobilize feelings.

[11] Although it is common to claim the contrary, I believe this is almost universal. Arguments cloud understanding, whether rational or emotional.

[12] Within the limits of good manners and civility, obviously. Do not regress to the Paleolithic.

[13] I mean dominance of the situation and not of the other person's mind or body.

[14] In other words: whip yourself with the lash of the will to tame the inner animal and avoid possession by negative feelings and thoughts. On this point, see Nietzsche (1884-1885/1985).

in the eyes. At the same time, be kind and accept her as she is, leaving her free to think and do whatever she wants.

To render useless the mental hells of stubbornness and debate, it is enough not to force your partner's opinions. Respect absolutely her opinions, worldviews, conceptions, etc., even when they are mistaken, false, ill-intentioned, absurd, selfish, and completely harmful to the relationship. However, communicate to her one-way and kindly, without debating, what you see regarding them and the consequences they have. Never try to oblige her to admit her own mistakes or to own up explicitly, verbally, to anything whatsoever. The acknowledgment of mistakes and the acceptance of responsibilities are achieved by letting them be what they are and handing the consequences back to them[15]. We hand back the responsibility and the consequences simply by not assuming them, by not taking them upon ourselves. Always reinforce that her opinions will be respected. The emotional realities of husband and wife are distinct and parallel (GOLEMAN, 1997), which is why it is a waste of time to try to force them to understand our point of view and, even less, to try to oblige them to assimilate our worldview and our idiosyncrasy.

The secret here consists in not opposing, that is, in allying ourselves with the continuous movements, following the fluctuations, oscillations, and alternations. For this, it is essential not to identify ourselves with the relationship, separating ourselves and seeing events from outside, like a spectator detached from the facts who does not consider them his own. In other words, we have to attain an inner state in which our partner's opinions and attitudes are no longer considered our problem but only hers, releasing ourselves from any responsibility regarding them, since it is not ours to bear, [15] In this way, in some cases, they come to become aware of their negative characteristics. I have observed that some even change their attitude of their own accord, after the effects of their reckless attitudes come back upon themselves. Becoming aware of one's own mistakes is something very individual, and one cannot oblige one's neighbor to do it. In truth, this is the central pillar of my theory: absolute adaptive acceptance. There is nothing more we can do except let them do whatever they want with their lives (but not with ours, obviously) and wait for them to savor the good and bad consequences of the paths they choose. Let us not delude ourselves: they will not return to the home, nor will they ever again feel pride in having their domestic work recognized and remunerated by their husbands. Nor will they feel pride in their traditional and distinguishing feminine characteristics: skirts, dresses, delicacy, beauty, softness, superior emotionality, etc. The trend that points toward the days to come is for them to become more and more similar to men and, therefore, more and more uninteresting. The future is bleak. I hope I am wrong.

as it does not belong to us. Both the companion and the relationship must be taken as strange entities[16].

Learning to separate oneself in order to hold a dialogue in emotional storms is not easy. Fatal magnetism tends to drag us into fights and disagreements[17]. It is necessary to resist charms and spells (LÉVI, 2001), and provocations of every nature, good as well as bad, keeping the lucidity and calm that the other party will lack in those moments: to be superior in understanding, patience, coldness, and kindness, conditions attained only by those who have dissolved their egos.

Learn to control your mind so as to keep quiet in the worst emotional hells. Endure the tortures and confusions in silence, like the Buddha. Resist all your partner's provocations aimed at drawing you into a debate. Be distant and mysterious. Speak as little as possible. Hold your tongue even if inside you are about to burst. The silence of the man who disappears within himself bothers them a great deal (ALBERONI, 1986/n.d.), and it is an excellent defense against emotional aggression because it strikes them unerringly. The act of shutting down, refusing to argue, destabilizes and disorients them emotionally (GOLEMAN, 1997).

The more we talk, the worse it will be. The more we lay out our points of view, the more we will be feeding the conflicts. It is better to listen to her and make only short, well-aimed, and destructive[18] interventions, for, as Solomon wrote:

> "The foolish woman [and not the lucid one, therefore] is clamorous; she is simple and knows nothing" (Proverbs, 9:13).

If you want to make everything worse and create a formidable hell, just discuss the relationship, try to reach agreement on your differences, etc.

[16] That is, entities that are not known and that one needs to observe, get to know, and understand.
[17] Which Goleman (1997) calls "floods of feeling."
[18] I mean the destruction of a few deceptions and mistakes that can be cleared up in such difficult moments.

9. On the impossibility of dominating the "weaker sex"

Our dear and dangerous females tirelessly try to dominate the relationship in order to impose on us the patterns they desire, which concern the frequency, intensity, and quality of the dates, the phone calls, the sex, the affectionate treatment, the talk, etc. Whoever loves more, that is, needs the other's love more, will give in and submit for fear of losing the beloved. Whoever loves less will come out victorious and will dominate the relationship.

The power to exercise dominance or to be dominated is closely bound up with physical beauty[1], in the woman's case, and with social prominence, in the man's case, although not only with these elements.

If you have a girlfriend or wife, you must already have noticed that she tends to resist almost everything you want, especially giving you sex exactly when you need it. This resistance is natural, and we should not protest, much less force anything. These are obstacles that her unconscious places before us to see whether we can overcome them and prove our masculine worth.

Although they are never admitted or acknowledged by women, the resistances never cease, not even after decades of marriage. When they resist, women in truth want to be enchanted to the point of total emotional intoxication. They want us to break the resistance by throwing them into a state of madness so that they can no longer resist. If we do not, they consider us incompetent and in time give us a fine pair of horns, because they need intense and crazy emotions[2]. This is the reason they try to dominate us instead of submitting passively.

Some ignorant men, desperate at being unable to exercise dominance over their women[3], attack them physically or psychologically. This attitude is unnecessary, as we will see below.

[1] Although beauty is relative and varies in meaning from one culture to another and even from one man to another. Regardless of his concepts of beauty, a man will tend to weaken more for those who, by his criteria, seem beautiful to him. As far as I am concerned, I do not go along with the stereotyped criteria and standards of the twentieth century (youth, body shapes, etc.)

[2] Because they are emotionally oriented beings.

[3] I mean the consented domination that results naturally from the renunciation of coercive domination.

Woman has sophisticated psychological mechanisms for getting around any attempt at domination. They are refractory to domination. They resist continually, even against brute force[4], and can only really be influenced by the dominance of an emotional strength superior to their own. Not all is lost...

There is a very effective means of protecting ourselves and at the same time dominating the relationship without going mad: it consists in renouncing the attempt to dominate the female, choosing instead to dominate our own feelings of possessiveness, jealousy, and other weaknesses through the death of our egos. This seems contradictory, but it really works, because women are contradictory and illogical beings in essence, or rather, beings who follow a logic contrary to the one we imagine[5].

Eliphas Lévi (1855/2001) tells us that women chain us through our desires[6]. The desires to be together, to receive sex, affection, love, etc., are weak points through which females take hold of males and bring them down. I add that, besides desires, they chain us through our feelings. Consequently, if we eliminate feelings and desires, we throw them into their own mental dungeons. The shot will backfire owing to the mirror effect, which throws the spell back onto the one who sent it. The woman will then fall into the very mental-emotional hell into which she tried to throw us[7]. The reason is very simple: since the sly ones need, continually and madly, to confirm that we suffer for them, they are forced to face their own frustration when they find the opposite.

[4] Machiavelli's old and well-known sentence (1513/1977; 1513/2001) portrays this impossibility: "Fortune is a woman, and to master her one must beat her and strike her.". This is not a misogynistic or violent sentence, but a comparison between woman and fortune, based on the fact that the former does not let herself be dominated. The intention of the comparison, however, is to show that fortune can be mastered only when we beat it, just as ignorant men in Machiavelli's time did with women, moved by desperate fury. Machiavelli is not recommending that one beat woman, but fortune. He uses woman in his sentence only as a comparison, with the aim of illustrating that woman does not let herself be dominated.

[5] This refers specifically to the romantic field and corresponds only to the formal (rational) sense of logic. However, feelings also have another logic, distinct from linear rational logic, which is the foundation of emotional intelligence and intuition.

[6] This is the well-known sentence already quoted: "Woman enchains thee through thy desires. Be master of thy desires and thou shalt enchain woman." (LÉVI, 1855/2001, p. 73)

[7] Which constitutes legitimate emotional self-defense and works only if the woman is a sly one who tries to cheat us in love. If the woman is honest and sincere in the relationship, there will be no spell to be returned, and she will not be affected emotionally by anything, for reason will be on her side.

From the beginning of the relationship, we should take more care with ourselves, with what we feel, than with the woman. This does not mean that we have to treat her badly, coldly, etc., but only that we need to surpass her in the fields in which we are weak and she is strong[8]. Jealousy, fury, possessiveness, etc. are weaknesses that are part of the ego and leave us dominated.

Rather than dominating the opposite sex, it is better to dominate the relationship. But to dominate the relationship we have to dominate ourselves. Consequently, everything comes down to self-mastery. Woman cannot be dominated, not even by brute force. If you ask her for something, your request will be kindly refused or postponed indefinitely. If you give an order, she will test you to find out how far you are capable of going, curious to know to what extent the relationship is vulnerable; she will refuse to comply and will watch your reactions to make sure of your capacity to displease her, obtaining by this means important information about the depth of your attachment, your degree of emotional dependence. If you attack her physically, you will have to answer to the police or to her relatives, besides proving her right. Consequently, there is no way out except to armor yourself and retaliate emotionally, with justice and in legitimate self-defense. Never let her reach conclusions and know how much you need her.

Woman will offer her treasures to the one who defeats her in her own domains:

> “Let woman be a plaything, pure and fine like the diamond, in which sparkle the virtues of a world that does not yet exist!
> Let the radiance of a star sparkle in your love! Let your hope say: ‘May I be the mother of the superman!’ (...)
> Let your honor endure in your love! Woman generally understands little about honor. Let your honor be to love more than you are loved and never to come in second place.” (NIETZSCHE, 1884-1885/1985, emphasis mine)

She will not give her treasures, and will never love more than she is loved, unless she is defeated in her resistances. But she will not be defeated unless she fears something: the loss of a special and different man.

[8] By fighting against ourselves and not against them.

Women love the strong[9] and despise the weak, submitting only to a power demonstrated and proven unequivocally in their own domains: feelings[10]. One must defeat them in two opposite fields: that of coldness and that of affection. We have to surpass them in strength[11] without letting ourselves be taken over by their weaknesses; that is, we need to be colder and more indifferent than they are toward us, but at the same time more affectionate and loving than they are toward us. Contradictory? Illogical? Yes! And effective! There is no other way out: be free of passion and, to a certain extent, theatrical. Obviously, you will not dominate her directly, by means of coercion, but if you reward her at the right moments with a certain affection, you may "tame" her through her own instincts, as is done with wild animals[12]. When she behaves badly, disappears, does not call, avoids or postpones sex, gives attention to or is nice to another guy, etc., be indifferent, scorn her, and disappear within yourself. She will resist; resist as well, until you break the resistance. Then, when the female submits, reward her with affection and other trifles, little love letters, flowers, etc., returning right afterward to your distance. Never become polarized in distance or in affection; alternate.

When we treat them in a merely affectionate way, they become bratty, rebellious, and provocative instead of recognizing the value of such wonderful treatment. When we treat them with authority[13], they become sweet and affectionate. From which one gathers that their provocations and brattiness are in truth requests for a firm masculine posture (JUNG, 1991), very little sentimental. The slightest opening or weakness is quickly perceived through animal instinct and exploited.

If you are not willing to be strong[14] and are not inwardly courageous, you had better give up being a male and turn into a butterfly... or else change your mind and resolve to acquire courage.

[9] In spirit.

[10] To make it clearer: it is as if it were a competition in which each party tries to outdo the other in the capacity for self-mastery. Whoever manages to endure more and to overcome the inner emotional hell more deeply is the winner.

[11] Inner

[12] Once again I return the provocation of the writer Salmansohn (1994).

[14] In Spirit.

I see many guys thinking that women will fall in love with them out of pity alone. They believe it is enough to give them love and that, in this way, reciprocation will be automatic. They are lost.

If you think that being a nice guy is enough to be appreciated... you are lost. Stick your head in the toilet and flush, for the good of future generations.

The main masculine weakness I have seen is the fear of loss. From it derive jealousy, sadness, discomfort, and many fights.

They constantly assess our limits and the degree of power they have over our will. They observe us and measure how far they can go. They play to the extreme. All with the intention of dominating the relationship and not being dominated.

If we really ignore these games, all they will have left are their own feelings. They will have played in vain and alone. They will feel lonely, afraid of losing us forever, and perhaps they will come to us without our needing to call them. But not even this is certain in the world of these enigmatic, absurd, and illogical beings[15] (from the point of view we have learned).

The most curious and contradictory thing is that, although they resist domination as best they can, females give themselves only to the one who exercises dominance[16], to the best.

Few things give a female as much pleasure as knowing that there is a male who suffers for her. Paradoxically, this same male is considered uninteresting and weak, not providing the strong emotions that leave them fascinated. At most, he will serve as a cuckolded husband. The greater the wretch's suffering, the greater her satisfaction and, contradictorily, her lack of interest. That is why they feel no pity for those who commit suicide over a great heartbreak. The man who kills himself for love is communicating that he is a weakling, and with that his sacrifice becomes meaningless.

[15] I mean illogicality in the romantic field and in the logical-rational sense of the word.

[16] I mean the consented, protective dominance resulting from the renunciation of coercive domination.

Instead of killing ourselves or killing her, it is better to kill our feelings and desires. Then we will be able to treat them as they treated us or are treating us.

The capacity to treat a woman as she treats us allows us to act as if we were her mirror. Her behaviors, and not her words, will be the elements that govern the relationship.

A great masculine mistake is to believe what women say. Another great mistake is to be fascinated by their affection, tears, and fragility, believing that they are signs that their heart has been given to us. Here begins our perdition. Let her say as much as she likes that she loves you, let her cry buckets, and believe only the attitudes you witness. Above all, be guided by concrete behaviors and not by useless and deceptive words. Do not run after what they say, because you will be watched as you fall into this weakness.

The world of the women we deal with in this book is a pestilent den of lies, dissimulation, manipulation, and deceit. This holds for all of them, to a greater or lesser degree, and has its origin in a remote historical past. The room for sincerity with these females seems to be nil or almost nil. Consequently, we have to treat them according to these laws, to which they are accustomed.

To dominate the relationship, one must be superior to the woman in her strengths. One must have the cold blood to be more dissembling and more affectionate than they are with us. It is also advisable to conceal our previous history of relationships, as they do. In this way we become mysterious.

When we defeat them in their own domains, that is, in the fields of feelings and emotional intelligence, which are the fields in which women move about at ease, they give themselves to us spontaneously. They begin to see us as unique, the best, and to consider us fit to guide and command them.

There are only two possible paths when we establish a prolonged relationship with a sly partner: to dominate her[17] completely, establishing rules, or to leave her absolutely free to do whatever she wants, encouraging her to do everything she shows to be part of her tendency. It seems more advisable to try first a patriarchal relationship, with full powers, especially with regard to contact with other males[18], and secondly, if she resists dominance, to go to the opposite extreme, releasing her into total freedom[19]. In both cases we cannot be in love, nor even love[20] the woman very much. The ideal is to like her just enough to bear her company[21] and enjoy the benefits of sex. Love, in this sense[22], is man's worst debasement and a serious defect.

Some women submit easily when we exercise a protective authority and let us guide their lives after they have tested and confirmed our firmness of purpose and security[23]. Others, more refractory owing to feminist influences, tend to resist more, and there are some who definitely do not submit. These last should be pushed in the opposite direction, for they have no vocation whatsoever for the role of wives, nor even for being steady companions. They serve only for casual and superficial sex, having no other use in our love life. They were born for casual sex and are not advisable for a serious relationship[24].

What makes the sly ones so refractory and hard to control is the chaotic and unstable nature of their intense passions and feelings. Their moods change suddenly, without any prior warning. One moment they are mad with passion and, suddenly, they simply do not want to see our face anymore. Therefore, they are beings who cannot be trusted much. Their dispositions alternate continually and do not automatically correspond to our goals, which is why we have to take advantage of the moments when they are "open," available, and susceptible to influences in order to work on their moods. When they are closed, we have to wait until they change.

[18] This is only an attempt, to check whether this dominant posture is what she wants and seeks in us.

[19] Thus meeting the newly discovered request.

[20] I mean emotional love and not conscious love.

[21] In time, it may happen that she becomes a companion as pleasant and important as a great friend or sister.

[22] Emotional love or romantic passion.

[23] Because that was exactly what they were seeking in us.

[24] This is the case of those who demand emotional commitment and fidelity from the man but offer, in return, only contradictory behaviors and doubts about their fidelity. Doubt causes an emotional irritation, and that is why we seek certainties (PEIRCE, 1887/n.d.).

Your girlfriend may be unpredictable, but she will try to induce you to become mechanical, expecting one behavioral pattern, so as to surprise you with other patterns, driving you crazy. Withstand the emotional storms. Be ready for anything. Do not let her contaminate your mind with absurd alternations of feelings. Stay centered and do not let yourself be dragged to either side.

Time is one of the greatest feminine allies. When you are resentful with just cause, when you keep your distance, your partner will patiently count on time for you to change. She will wait and wait, patiently, for your transformation. There is even a slang expression for this wile: “letting him stew.” It is another form of dominance over our mind.

Never forbid anything. Prohibition stimulates disobedience[25] and provides arguments in favor of a supposed arbitrary authoritarianism on your part. Instead of forbidding, leave the little she-devil with no way out by creating situations that turn the consequences of her undesirable attitudes back onto her own head. Communicate, unilaterally, decisions that affect her as a result of her own mistakes. Tie her up with her own ideas and attitudes.

10. Alternation

The relationship should never become polarized in continuous coldness or continuous affection.

We have to be indifferent and, at the same time, ardently romantic.

The exclusively affectionate man becomes repulsive, and the woman comes to consider him clingy. On the other hand, prolonged distance and indifference cool the relationship[1]. Consequently, we have to alternate our conduct, leaving her confused, not knowing what we really feel, exactly as she does with us. Cultivate the coldness of Zen Buddhism combined with the warmth of the Kama Sutra.

[25] For prohibition has the effect of stimulating desire instead of containing it.

[1] “The perpetuity of caresses soon breeds satiety, boredom, antipathy, just as a constant coldness or severity gradually distances and destroys affection” (LÉVI, 2001, p. 226).

We have to surpass the woman[2] in her opposite, bipolar tendencies. We have to steer the relationship and manage feminine feelings as they appear, instead of trying to change them or subdue them.

Because they know emotional mechanisms well, women tend to play games of alternation (LÉVI, 1855/2001). These are games that vary greatly in form and are marked by oscillation between opposites: they draw near and then pull away, they behave as if they were faithful and then admire other males, etc.

The best way to tear apart these odious emotional games with opposites consists in "pushing" the woman precisely in the unexpected direction[3]. The responsibility and the blame that are hers, and that she tries to transfer to us, must be handed back very amicably.

Example: when a woman makes a complimentary remark about another man in front of her husband or boyfriend, or spends an hour talking to some nice-guy-looking imbecile at a party, she generally expects her husband to react with jealousy and suffer, giving her satisfaction[4]. If the husband, on the contrary, forces (with real actions) her to get closer to the guy, he will have two advantages:

1) he will find out whether the woman is faithful or is really the "tramp[5]" she is showing herself to be, since she keeps giving another male the time of day and does not admit it[6];

2) he will leave her disoriented.

Here, then, is one more good reason to eliminate jealousy. Jealousy, the baleful consequence of being in love, is an important tool in the games of alternation they play to torture us and drive us crazy.

[2] I mean the competition for self-mastery already explained.

[3] That is, toward what she is trying to do, toward the undesirable attitude or behavior she is trying to adopt. We will not, therefore, be forcing feminine free will by adopting this posture.

[4] The satisfaction that comes from jealousy is due to the realization that the husband suffers from the feeling of attachment and that he still feels for the woman the emotional love of romantic passion.

[5] In the sense given by the Michaelis (1995) and Aurélio (FERREIRA, 1995) dictionaries.

[6] In general, the sly one totally denies any possibility of involvement with the "jerk" to whom she devotes her exclusive attention, but deep down she knows very well the implications of giving a great deal of attention to a sexually active adult heterosexual male. Although she feigns and claims ignorance, she is not unaware that, if she were to get naked, he would jump on her.

The sly woman does not want to take responsibility for her attitudes. She wants a “serious commitment” but does not want to give up her “little friends,” she wants to have male friends but does not want to be treated as a “tramp[7],” she wants to hang out with unhappily married girlfriends or ones of doubtful conduct, etc. Therefore, we have to develop mechanisms to force them to take on the consequences of what they do. Obviously, we have nothing against prostitutes or the like (and we even hold them in special esteem!!!!), but rather against the attitudes of other women who act in bad faith and play with our feelings, feigning faithfulness of feeling without giving it, letting us build false expectations. It is these who deserve no pity. The problem focused on here lies in the lack of sincerity in toying with other people’s feelings while trying to dodge the consequences, and not in opting for a multiplicity of partners, nor in the choices people make for their lives. To reinforce the point: prostitutes are not “tramps” in the sense we are dealing with here, because they seem to be the most sincere women there are, since they do not try to deceive us by pretending to be prudish, and, besides, they keep busy full-time. Prostitutes do not live in idleness. In Ancient Greece there were even professional courtesans, the hetaerae, who cultivated physical beauty and psychological refinement, rising above ordinary women (JOHNSON, 1987).

To continue... Do not feed the illusion of discovering through questions what they really feel for you, or that it might be confessed. You only find out what goes on in these women’s hearts in extreme situations. Give no importance to anything they say, for their useless words are contradictory, vague, deceptive, and incoherent, serving only to mislead. The degree of her emotional dependence on you will only be revealed by force, in an extreme situation such as, for example, total withdrawal on your part because of some serious mistake she has made. Hence the importance of being free of passion, so as to have the capacity to remain indifferent for a long time, if necessary. However, we should not become polarized in coldness, but rather alternate. Let us look at this more closely.

In dealing with a woman, there are only two basic options:

1) to be cold, indifferent, and sometimes somewhat aggressive[8];

[7] In the sense given by the Michaelis (1995) and Aurélio (FERREIRA, 1995) dictionaries.

2) to be affectionate and kind.

If we become polarized exclusively on either side, we will lose her. The ideal is to alternate according to the fluctuations of mood and the deliberate oscillations of the feminine little games: when your girlfriend's behavior does not please you, give her the cold shoulder and ignore her. You will then see her desperately trying to find out what is happening. Do not reveal it, or you will lose dominance of the situation. Find a way to show her that she is being rejected for her bad conduct, and hold out until the change happens the way you want[9]. Then reward her with lots of affection and little notes; be a friend, understanding and protective, but stay on the lookout, on alert, because the problem will soon return. Train her[10] in this way, little by little, but change the pattern now and then so as not to become predictable, or you will be the one dominated.

When we are cold and distant, two possibilities open up: the woman becomes desperate[11], growing insecure, or she forgets you for good. Either way, you will find out the real content of the feelings that were hidden behind the deceptive words. If she is really in love, she will not let you go; she will come after you. If she does not come, it is because she never loved you before and only wanted to string you along[12]. Do not be afraid of the truth. Be cold without fear, but not continually indifferent.

When we are affectionate and attentive, two other possibilities likewise open up: the woman grows tired, considering us clingy, or she likes this protective affection and becomes dependent. If the lady becomes bored, it means she never gave you real importance and only saw you as a sucker. If she does not grow sick of it and does not avoid you, it is because she really is becoming dependent. Watch out for pretense. Do not always be affectionate; alternate to confuse her[13].

[8] I mean a slight aggressiveness in manner, typical of males, and not violent conduct.
[9] Provided this is fair, obviously.
[10] As Salmansohn (1994) recommends that women do with men.
[11] Because her manipulative wile has been dismantled.
[12] Possibly because she had ulterior motives and was interested in other things (a car, money, showing off, having an emotional slave, etc.) and not in the man himself.
[13] As they do with us.

Some females appreciate virile attitudes in males and provoke them to see them enraged and threatening (JUNG, 1991). I suggest that you not fall for it unless you want to feign a state of fury, because it is a form of test that confirms to them our degree of submission to their manipulations.

Be unpredictable, offering love and affection at the most unexpected moments. Surprise her by calling when everything suggests you will not, but do it rarely, in a disconcerting way.

Be alert to perfect simulations of submission, passion, and surrender that conceal indifference. This is an originally feminine gift, but it can be developed by man to unthinkable levels, even surpassing the peak of feminine dissimulation. We can say that this is the supreme secret of seduction and dominance: to simulate perfectly an intense and submissive passion without really having this feeling. It is this power that gives females the ability to pass suddenly from one extreme to the other without the slightest disturbance, leaving us crazed in the middle of the confusion.

The rite of enchantment strikes the “victim” full on when it is performed in a situation that makes it unexpected, because it is the opposite of the situations in which it would normally occur. An intense declaration of love made after days of coldness, distance, or hostility has more effect than if it is made during long romantic periods. The same holds for reproaches and “punishments.”

The impact of a melting declaration of love will be more intense if it is preceded by a period of distance and coldness, and vice versa. Therefore, when your partner stubbornly refuses sex and affection, hold out. Wait until she comes looking for you. Then go to the opposite extreme, having sex intensely until she is exhausted, and pulling away right afterward.

The more exalted and intense the rite of enchantment (of love or of hatred), the more effective its power will be. However, the greater also will be the risk we run of being victimized by it, dragged along by the passion unleashed (LÉVI, 1855/2001). To intoxicate your female with love, you must feign being absolutely mad with passion, yet at the same time you must not really be so. The danger here lies in feigning the madness of passion and actually falling in love in the course of the simulation, which throws the would-be seducer into a ridiculous situation:

> "Thus the ignorant operator is always astonished to obtain results contrary to those he set out to achieve, for he does not know how to cross or alternate his action; he wishes to bewitch his enemy, and it is he himself who brings misfortune upon himself and falls ill; he wants to make himself loved, and he falls madly, miserably in love with women who mock him (...)." (LÉVI, 2001, p. 227, emphasis mine)

On the other hand, a fearsome man who softens his extreme severity by tempering it occasionally with acts of kindness, using it to protect the woman and give her security, becomes fascinating, for he will be alternating and crossing his action.

Alternation is possible only when we develop the opposite characteristics latent in our psyche and integrate them, achieving what Jung calls "conjunction" (conjunctio)[14]. We all have opposite, complementary inner possibilities that need to be developed: delicacy and strength, fury and tranquility, coldness and ardor, etc. We need to be simultaneously good and bad, merciful and cruel, malleable and firm, using these characteristics according to the needs that arise[15].

11. Why they observe us

Our behavior is the target of feminine curiosity (that is why there are gossips on street corners). When they are involved with a man, everything he does, what he wears, what he eats, etc. is an object of curiosity for these superficial beings[1].

We men tend to be incompetent at dealing with emotions and interpreting facial expressions (GOLEMAN, 1997), which is why we become disoriented in the war of passion. Women, on the other hand, when they observe men, seek to understand what is going on in their heads and in their hearts. This is how they come to know our emotional limits, so they can play with us to the extreme in total safety.

[14] Jung deals with this in his book "Mysterium Coniunctionis."

[15] I mean modulated furies, malices, and cruelties, consciously directed against the wrong things in life. What we normally call "evil" are animal instinctive forces displaced from civilized human reality because they are autonomous and are not under the control of consciousness. This maladjustment disappears when we assimilate them fully into consciousness. On this point, see Sanford (1988) and Nietzsche (1886/1998).

[1] Man's superficiality manifests itself through other characteristics, which will not be detailed here because that is not the aim of the book.

Our degree of affective-sexual dependence is measured by the woman through continuous observation. Hence the importance of confusing her[2] with disconcerting attitudes.

Observing the other allows one to detect his behavioral patterns, identify his ways of thinking, and predict his reactions. When we are the object of observation, we become predictable and lose our mystery. When we lose our mystery, we lose the capacity to surprise and become vulnerable.

A common rule in dealing with the female sex is the need to be on standby, prepared for the improbable. Once they know our psychic structures through observation, the witches become capable of surprising us with unexpected reactions, and they do so precisely because they know what our expectations are. The curious thing is that this is not the product of intellectual analysis but of an instinctive and unconscious tendency to act outside the other's patterns of expectation.

It is a great danger to become mechanical in our expectations, believing that feminine reactions will be the expected ones. As in combat, we will be struck and disconcerted by attacks we did not foresee and against which we have no response-reactions immediately ready to be delivered. At this level, man tends to lose the game because he looks for the answers intellectually, whereas woman delivers them through emotional impulses, which makes them much faster[3] than us, but not invincible, as we will see.

Obviously, I am referring to unpleasant surprises and not to pleasant ones. It is common, for example, for our protective, attentive, or affectionate attitudes to be disdained if they are not placed in a correct context of evident lack of interest. If we are mechanical in our expectations, we will be surprised by disdain, which is the opposite of what we would expect in such circumstances. Consequently, the solution is to have a contrary response-reaction available like an ace up our sleeve. This contrary and surprising response-reaction, in this case, consists of phrases or attitudes that strike her self-esteem, wounding her painfully through horrifications or resolute displays of rejection[4].

[2] As they do with us.
[3] And therefore superior in this field.

Disdain indicates absence of the fear of loss, unconcern about pleasing, and the certainty that we are already caught. More deeply, there is possibly an exaggeratedly positive self-image (the woman thinks she is the hottest thing on Earth). We can provoke a strong and disturbing cognitive dissonance if we reject her resolutely, drawing her attention in a terrible way to the fact that there has been an ingratitude whose natural consequence is repulsion.

Obviously, passion prevents us from having such attitudes. We need a great deal of emotional intelligence to win the little games.

Our suffering in love makes them happy because it raises their self-esteem. This suffering may stem from irritation, affective deprivation, sexual deprivation, and longing. It is a need they have, and when it is not satisfied, it leaves them immensely sad and disturbed, because they feel incompetent to attract and hold on to a man.

We are dealing with emotional defenses and attacks. Defenses are penetrated by surprising. One surprises by shocking, by acting in the most improbable way possible, which requires freedom of action and decondition-ing. However, if we do not calculate the effects correctly, the reactions we provoke may be undesirable, and we will be the ones surprised. It is dangerous to risk shocking indiscriminately and in any old way[5].

The one who irritates is in command of the relationship, and the one who is irritated is being commanded. The irritating person is the active agent, and the one who suffers the irritation is the passive agent. Through observation, women perceive our irritations, discover our tendencies, beliefs, [4] Which should be used only as a means of legitimate emotional defense. This use is justified only when the sly one has demonstrably taken the initiative of attacking us and wounding our feelings.

[5] This happens when we do not have reason on our side and are wrong, or are not acting honestly in legitimate self-defense. It also happens when we want to cause emotional harm or do not limit ourselves to the goal of merely preserving the integrity of our feelings without attacking gratuitously or for selfish motives. By proceeding in this way, the emotional aggressor hands the moral high ground to the other party and becomes unjust, suffering the consequences of the shot that will backfire.

needs, desires, and wants, and lead us. To turn the game around, it is we who have to irritate them (correctly!), while at the same time observing their reactions and following the whole process without identifying ourselves with it. But we will not be able to irritate them if we are not immune to their provocations. Therefore, there are three important points here: observe, resist, and irritate. It is a war in which the weapons are provocations and the shield is resistance. Over time, our lady friends have learned to control us emotionally, playing with our feelings in infinite ways. They provoke in us, at their pleasure, anger, desire, happiness, enthusiasm, frustration, the feeling of being belittled, etc. To defeat them, we have to fight with the same weapons, being more resistant and more provocative than they are with us.

A very common way in which we are provoked to the point of madness consists in being stimulated (by promises of heavenly encounters, wonderful sex, etc.) and then frustrated. This is a very interesting process in which they usually lure us with promises that are implicit (very rarely explicit) in their conduct, creating certain expectations in us, only to surprise us afterward, frustrating us on the most varied pretexts, generally emotional ones, while they observe us. To turn this game around, all we need to do is apply the same procedure back, offering and frustrating, or, if this does not work, creating situations that leave her with no way out. Observing the whole process in order to unmask it also tends to produce results.

Since this pattern is common to the overwhelming majority of the sly ones, it follows that, deep down, they are predictable and not unpredictable as they seem. However, they hide their predictability in order to disconcert us.

In sum, we can say that we are observed continuously so that our limits, desires, and feelings may be identified. Identifying them is necessary so that they can be aroused and frustrated in sudden games of emotional hell-raising.

12. How to Deal with Women Who Run Away

I have seen many men suffering at the hands of women who attract them and then run away. There are also women who run away when the man wants a definitive answer about a love affair that ended unresolved.[1] I have discovered a very good way for us to reach and capture these runaways with ease.

The runaways induce us to pursue them through the continuous subliminal suggestion that they are prizes we do not deserve. Their deep-rooted belief that they are desirable overflows subliminally and induces us to chase after them, which must be avoided at all costs.

What we must do with the runaways is corner them mentally. How? By giving them an ultimatum so as to throw the responsibility into their hands, forcing them to make a decision within a very short deadline, creating situations that leave them with no way out. Let us look at this more closely.

The runaways' strategies vary a great deal. Sometimes they show interest at the beginning but, as soon as you begin to show that you reciprocate, they avoid contact. They stop answering phone calls, stop writing, send word that they are not in when we look for them, etc. All with the intention[2] of forcing you to pursue her. They may also make dates and not show up. The more you go after her, the more you confirm that you are interested and the more the runaway avoids you, happy as can be! The intention is to measure your degree of persistence, excite your desire, and keep you hooked. Some take pleasure in the act of rejecting.

By way of example, and not as an encouragement to adultery, I will mention the case of a young man who flirted with a married woman only by telephone. Whenever they saw each other on the street, they both flirted, but the adulteress said nothing, claiming to be afraid of her husband. Nevertheless, she was always calling him and saying she was in love, etc., to attract him and confuse him. Suddenly, at the moment when the poor wretch was showing himself most interested and in love, the little rascal stopped answering his calls. Whenever the poor guy called and identified himself, the "tramp[3]" hung up immediately. She was measuring his degree of persistence.

[1] Alberoni (1986/n.d.) tells us that this sudden flight is intended to imprison the man, keeping him loving her and desiring her for his whole life.

[2] The unconscious has goals and intentions.

[3] In the sense given by the Michaelis (1995) and Aurélio (FERREIRA, 1995) dictionaries.

Then, one day, the lovesick fellow manned up and called her. But before the lady could think, he said in a firm and decisive voice: "If you don't answer the next time I call, you will have given me the certainty that you don't love me, and I will forget you forever." The next day, he called again and was answered kindly. He managed to turn the runaway into a good girl, because he cornered her in her own feelings. Unfortunately, she was a runaway who was cheating on her good husband. I am not praising the act of flirting with other men's wives, but only using the example to illustrate how the psyche of the runaways works and how we must act to catch them.

The runaways want to keep us emotionally hooked through doubt. Many just want to string us along, keeping us chasing after them without giving sex in return. They know that when they suddenly avoid us, we become dominated by our own feelings. They are very fond of making us waste our time, and they have fun watching us run after them like a bunch of imbeciles. They like to run away, run away, and run away; they take pleasure in this act because they know, instinctively, that they will leave unresolved doubts and questions in the man's mind, and a person who has unresolved love or sexual issues with someone remains "tied." The runaways' intention is to keep us bound to them by means of doubt,[4] preferably for all eternity. To turn the tables, all you need to do is give them an ultimatum. The ultimatum must be the notification of a situation that corners her, making her flights and evasions work as a decision in favor of ending the relationship. Let us look at a hypothetical example:

1) The runaway attracts you, pretending to be interested or in love;

2) You show interest and begin to be avoided by the runaway;

3) You reach her somehow, by letter or telephone, and tell her in a short, blunt, and decisive way, without the slightest room for discussion, more or less the following: "If you don't give me a clear answer by...(deadline set by you), you will have given me the certainty that you don't want anything more to do with me, and I will forget you forever."

[4] For doubt creates an unbearable emotional irritation in the human being (PEIRCE, 1887/n.d.).

That way you will have cornered her. The sly one may even keep running away for a while but, as the end of the deadline approaches, her flights become clear answers to your doubt, and she falls into despair as she realizes she has no way out. In this way we reach the unconscious desire that motivates her, and we will truly know whether the runaway wants something with us or not. It is an ultimatum with a chronological countdown that transforms even the most evasive and contradictory indecisions, attitudes, and flights into clearly defined situations that eliminate all doubt from our mind and from the mind of the slippery runaway.[5]

When we reach them by telephone, the runaway usually hangs up. What she wants is simply to have the pleasure of slamming the phone down on you. Get ahead of her: say objectively what you have to say and hang up first, robbing her of the pleasure.

The runaways raise a lot of hell over the telephone. Being the most widely used means of personal communication nowadays, the telephone is the technological tool most used by the sly ones in their little games. Just to make it clearer, the runaways' telephone torments are usually the following:

- asking for or accepting your number, promising to call but not keeping the promise;
- not returning your messages or not answering when you call, even while sitting right there next to the phone;
- leaving the phone switched off full-time for a long period.

In all the cases above, the damned woman wants to keep you after her, chasing her. She is getting satisfaction from the chase. What motivates her is the certainty that she is being sought and that she is rejecting the one who seeks her. When you finally reach her and ask for an explanation, the excuses are flimsy, ridiculous, and would not convince even a donkey.

[5] The intention of this ultimatum is not to force the woman to desire us, nor to change her feelings about us, but rather to discover the reality hidden behind the apparently contradictory behavior so that we can give our lives a suitable direction. It is not a strategy of manipulation but of counter-manipulation, that is, of dismantling manipulative wiles.

To break this hell and corner the sly one, you must hit her exactly at the point that motivates her: the certainty that, by avoiding you, she makes you want her more and more. By pursuing her with ever greater intensity, you are giving her certainties that you are more and more in love in the same proportion as you are avoided. Therefore, it is at this point that you must wound her[6] squarely, breaking down all her motivations. How? By reaching her by some means (letter, telephone, a message through a friend, etc.) and communicating a sentence to her: that her next flight will give you the definitive certainty that she was a lying, fraudulent "tramp[7]" from the very beginning, and will thus bring about a total and definitive break. In this way, you hit her at the nerve center, because the damned woman believes that, by running away, she is intensifying your passionate suffering and your doubts. If she suddenly learns that this attitude will unleash the opposite effects, she will be shocked, confused, and left with no way out. You will have created a cognitive dissonance. The sentence must be clear, direct, and terrible, leaving no room for any other interpretation. It must leave the runaway with no alternative other than to seek you out within a short deadline. No other alternative should remain because, if one does, she will not seek you out. If even so the runaway does not come back, then it is because she was really never any good and should have been scorned as leftovers from the beginning. Some examples of messages that can be sent by telephone, letter, or in person in such cases are the following:

"If you don't look for me by (date set by you), it's because you were never any good, and I will never look for you again!"

"If you don't look for me by (date), don't ever look for me again."

"I'm giving you one last chance to come back to me by (date); if you don't, disappear from my life forever."

"Look for me by (date) or else disappear forever."

She must feel the weight of your determination and the power of your sentence. It is almost never possible to reach them to speak to them in person, since they hang up the phone and usually, ridiculously, hide and avoid you in the street so that you feel as if you were a stalker. So one must have alternative means at one's disposal. What matters is to reach them and shock them, hitting them hard in their feelings. This requires a lot of courage and willingness to lose.

[6] For she is wounding you in advance.
[7] In the sense given by the Michaelis (1995) and Aurélio (FERREIRA, 1995) dictionaries.

Some runaways also like to torment their husbands and boyfriends by promising and avoiding sex. In this case, they avoid going to bed when the poor wretch needs it, or they promise to give it and refuse at the crucial moment. They usually promise him paradise during the day and invent excuses at night. The best thing to do in these cases is to find a way to throw the bomb back into her hands. One way to do this is to measure how long the refusal lasts and make this rhythm official, announcing that on the other days nothing will be expected, presenting this as her decision. It is usually also very effective to state explicitly that, by refusing sex, the runaway is morally authorizing us to exchange her for another, even if she denies it and does not formally articulate such authorization. Then the feminine imagination will go to work with jealousy, and perhaps the situation will be reversed.

Do not forget: when you make an appointment (a date, a phone call), you must corner her by means of deadlines. If you leave the agreement open, you will probably be cheated.

What feeds the runaways' behavior is the unconscious idea that you will be available, even after many years, like a spare tire (they are so shameless that they even call this wile "keeping the spare"). They lean on this idea and do not feel the slightest need to face you.

The idea of being desired makes women happy:

"The happiness of man is called 'I want.' The happiness of woman is called 'He wants.'" (NIETZSCHE, 1884-1885/1995)

Knowing they are desired is more than enough for the runaways. They nourish themselves unconsciously on the pursuit. They want to be pursued so that they can reject the pursuer. The possibility of rejecting gives them the feeling of being the hottest, the most desirable of all women on Earth. When they run away, they do so to induce pursuit and even, sometimes, to make a fuss, drawing the attention of everyone around them. Sometimes they initially send signals of interest to induce the male to seek them out but then reject him, telling their friends about their triumph. To get to them, first we must not pursue, and second, we must transform their flights into unmistakable decisions in favor of ending the relationship, into clear communications of disinterest. In this way, we destroy the doubts they try to instill in our mind, turning the spell back on them. The dynamite is thrown back into the hands of whoever lit the fuse.

It is all a matter of psychological cornering. What matters is to leave her with no way out, so as to force her either to come running straight to you or to put an end, once and for all, to any doubts in your mind. The work consists in isolating the runaway in her own mental dungeon, making her confront her own contradictory feelings and desires. By creating a definitive situation that allows no doubt whatsoever, the real content of her feelings will show itself. Then you will know what you really mean to her, how you are seen, and what you are for, because there are many women who just want to keep us in reserve as a guarantee for old age or for some material or emotional emergency (the famous “spare,” or spare tire). I know of a case in which a woman kept a young man in reserve and later accepted him as her boyfriend when she became pregnant by another man, who had run off, in order to pin the paternity on him. Cases like this are frequent.

I have observed that the feminine unconscious seems to want to be cornered, to ask for a confinement that does not allow escape (evasions or excuses). As long as you allow any mental openings that make it possible to avoid responsibilities, the runaway will avoid you, blaming you for everything and considering you uninteresting. On the other hand, if you corner her mentally, you will be considered superior to the other males in intelligence, emotional strength, confidence, and determination. You will also communicate subliminally that you will not remain available for all eternity and that you have access to other, better females (more beautiful and more sincere) or more important things to do.

13. The Impossibility of Negotiation

Sly women usually resist attempts at negotiation or steer them only in the directions that suit them. When the negotiation takes a course favorable to the man, they label him “intransigent” or “radical,” even if they are completely in the wrong in their demands.

Malleable men, who give in on unacceptable points, are seen as weak, indecisive, and manipulable. Regardless of what they say, these women will decide in favor of the one who stands firm in his point of view to the end and shows that he will not back down for anything, not even for fear of losing them. This is especially true in cases of “innocent friendships” with other men.

If we are democratic, kind, malleable, etc., this will not be recognized or seen as a reason for gratitude but, on the contrary, as a weakness to be exploited, an opportunity to use the other as an emotional slave. The smallest openings will be quickly perceived. Moreover, we will be communicating that we are not capable of protecting or guiding anyone.

The essence of what such females are is absolutely different from what they themselves say, which is why we must be guided only by their attitudes and never by their absurd, futile talk. Talk is one of their main mechanisms of deception in negotiations.

Feminine feelings and intentions reveal themselves only in the extreme situations in which they are put to the test. Outside this sphere, everything will be confused, absurd, and contradictory. For these reasons, it is better to communicate conditions to them than to count on understanding.

When the conditions for the relationship are communicated in an absolutely clear way, there is no way out for the woman. Whichever way she tries to move, she will be revealing herself. In this way we will discover whether she is a saint, a good wife, a mere sexual friend, or a deceiving “tramp[1].”

[1] In the sense given by the Michaelis (1995) and Aurélio (FERREIRA, 1995) dictionaries.

The conditions need to be formulated in such a way that even the refusal to take a position and indifference have a clear and definite meaning. Since one of the greatest feminine weapons is contradiction, contradictory attitudes and the absence of attitudes also need to have a precise, clearly formulated meaning.

There is an immense difference between asking and stating decisively. The woman will not give up her bad habits (infrequent or poor-quality sex, friendly attitudes toward other men, etc.) just because you asked. She will only do so if she is told unequivocally that those attitudes will result, with no appeal, in the end of the relationship or in the ruin of her image. If you try to negotiate, she will perceive, with her diabolical sixth sense,[2] a fear of losing her, and she will play with this fear to its extreme limit. Therefore, the way out is not to be afraid.

But in order not to be afraid, one must not fall passionately in love. That is why the death of the ego[3] is indispensable. He who is emotionally dependent will be incapable of imposing conditions without wavering. The woman, through instinct, will sense his weakness and will resist him until she bends him. The more we give in, the more we will have to give in, until we go completely mad.

14. Why It Is Necessary to Hide Our Feelings and Our Conduct

Women are imaginative and intuitive beings, very little rational, who are guided by feelings and not by logic or reason.[1] Thus, they show little

[2] In men, the diabolical character does not operate in such an intuitive way. In some cases, this feminine capacity to intuit or sense the man's feelings, that is, whether he is suffering from love, whether he misses her and is anxious to see her, etc., even seems to overcome the barriers of space, bordering on the paranormal.

[3] By death of the Ego(s) we must understand the dissolution (assimilation) of the psychic aggregates or autonomous complexes. In a certain lecture, whose reference for citation I do not recall now, Jung stated that complexes are constituted by some kind of ego, and this is exactly what the V.M. Samael Aun Weor states. The usual Ego of psychology, the autonomous complexes of the unconscious, Freud's Ego, Superego, and Id (1923/1997), and the so-called Alter Ego or Higher Self are all, deep down, merely different forms of Ego, which need to be dissolved so that the soul may be freed and its various one-sided, compulsive, and opposing impulses may be assimilated and fused. The egoic vision is a distortion of reality, because the multiple "I's" subjectivize perceptions (SAMAEL AUN WEOR, n.d.). Through comprehension, we gradually correct the cognitive distortion inherent in each compulsively one-sided vision, thus making objective the vision we have of the object of desire or aversion.

[1] This does not imply inferiority but only difference. As Kant (1993/1764) says, they have a greater vocation for the beautiful than for the sublime. What defines beauty is agreeableness to the feelings. Exhaustive logical work is aggressive to femininity. When a woman becomes excessively rational and cerebral, she stops being attractive to men. Human males are not sexually resistance to the truth and need to live in illusion and lies (SCHOPENHAUER, 2004). This is proper to the feminine nature.[2]

They cannot bear raw reality, and they despair or become enraged when we are absolutely direct, unmasking them, but at the same time, curiously, they admire us for such qualities, because they are highly contradictory in themselves and in relation to their own opinions.[3]

When we excite and exalt their imaginations in the right directions, we can dominate them.[4] But if we are not strong enough, we will be the ones attracted by a logical brain (in the rational sense of the word), because its owner does not provide them with the pleasant sensation provided by a woman whose brain makes her delicate, sweet, and intuitive (KANT, 1993/1764). If a woman wants to attract men, she should differentiate herself from them as much as possible, becoming as feminine as possible. Her thoughts, feelings, movements, facial expressions, tones of voice, clothing, etc., should be typical of a woman, and this advice should help those who do not fit the dictatorial stereotypes of beauty. This feminine typification of conduct has two poles: the positive and the negative. The feminine world is the world of light and pleasant things and not that of logical things, which are exhausting and heavy for the mind. For a woman, "wrong" or "bad" is whatever causes unpleasant feelings. This does not mean that they are illogical in the broad and absolute sense of the word, but only in its usual sense, which implies linear rationality. In the common sense of the word logic, that is, of logic as linear, focal, heavy, exhausting, and rigorous mental processes, women are illogical. However, in the emotional sense of the word logic, meaning the coherent chaining of feelings in relation to certain ends (not always altruistic ones), they are entirely logical and coherent. In other words, women are logical in an emotional sense and not in the common rational sense. Being rational is not synonymous with being intelligent (GOLEMAN, 1997). Emotional intelligence is much faster than rational intelligence in solving its problems and penetrates fields impenetrable to the intellect. Feminine illogicality disconcerts and confuses the masculine intellect, which is illogical from the emotional point of view, and brings them successive victories in the war of passion. Considering woman as different from man and more inclined to the emotional, the beautiful, and the pleasant than to the rational and the logical (in the usual sense of the word) contains no idea of inferiority except for those who mistakenly deify the intellect as the means of cognition par excellence. Intellect and intelligence are not identical. There are people who are extremely intellectual and, at the same time, stupid, incapable of finding solutions to simple problems of real life. I once knew a great scholar, one of those who seem like living libraries, who was highly limited in intelligence, being incapable of grasping obvious and simple everyday things. Therefore, any accusation of prejudice that may be imputed to this point of view will in fact be the reflection of the prejudice that the accuser himself carries within and projects, most likely in a victimist form. Likewise, the accusation of misogyny imputed to Kant is totally unfounded and is nothing more than a fallacious wile to spare the feminine profile from realistic, incisive, direct, and absolutely sincere philosophical criticism, a decoy to prevent dialectical reflection about the feminine. There are light and non-rational forms of intelligence. The statistical data presented by Van Creveld (SCHELP, 2006), which show men with a higher IQ than women, were most likely gathered taking into consideration only the usual rational intelligence. Put another way, so as not to scandalize so much, we could say that feminine rationality and logic are paradoxical, in the sense given to this word by Fromm (1976). In fact, what modern Western civilization considers "irrational" and "illogical" corresponds simply to forms of reasoning and logic that are nonlinear, nonfocal, and do not exclude opposites. While the masculine mind excludes, focuses, penetrates, and deepens, the feminine mind encompasses and articulates.

[2] And of the masculine nature too. However, here we are dealing with the feminine form in which the human tendency, which seems to be universal, to lie and not to bear reality expresses itself.

[3] From the logical-rational masculine point of view, obviously. Let us remember that this book was written for adult heterosexual men.

[4] By leading them in the direction of their own feelings and desires. As has already been explained, this is not selfish coercive domination but the guiding of pre-existing feminine desires, without any violation of free will. Why the word "dominate"? Because what the woman desires can become our goal too when we destroy the I's, although without the previous libidinal conditioning. When we no longer have desires, feminine desires are accepted by us without resistance and even come to be part of our objectives. This implies a dominance because, from that moment on, what the other dominated. Therein lies the danger and the need not to fall passionately in love. The tendency toward vehement denial of reality creates a hell in the masculine mind because we males are logical (from the point of view of what the Western mentality considers to be "logical," that is, linear causal rationality that excludes opposites). Therefore, the desire to always know the truth about the woman (whom she goes around with and what she does when she is away from us, what she really feels, etc.) is a weakness.

It is legitimate to deceive the women who intend, all the time, to do the same to us.[5] There are hardly any sincere women left, since they all seem to be dissembling creatures who deceive or hide facts.[6]

The concealment of facts and, above all, of real feelings is one of the great feminine weapons. When we do not know what is going on in someone's heart, we cannot make decisions and we are at their mercy. Through contradictory attitudes and words, the sly ones prevent us from taking definite positions in the relationship, yet they ceaselessly demand such positions from us, accusing us of being indecisive, insecure, etc. Younger men generally fall party wants to do is exactly what we want her to do. It is a dominance that reflects the mastery of oneself and the renunciation of the domination of the other. Although it seems contradictory, when we leave a person absolutely free to do whatever she wants and prefer to change ourselves, dissolving our desires in relation to her, we are exercising a dominance, in the sense that we are in total control of the situation and that we are allowing, and even encouraging, the other person to be led by her own desires. The death of the egos makes a man free of volitional conditionings and develops an extreme capacity for adaptation. Since, after this death, there is no opposition or conflict between their desires and ours, because we no longer have desires to conflict, it then follows that feminine desires come to be accepted without resistance on our part. Therefore, what the woman will desire to do will coincide completely with what we accept, and even desire, that she do. However, since we will be free of volitional conditioning and the partner will not, she will be conditioned to do what she desires while we will be unconditioned. Our act of approving and accepting the feminine conduct that was once undesirable, and is now acceptable, will be a conscious and voluntary act. The final result is that we will be exercising a dominance over the situation involving the partner, and through her own desires, without in any way violating her freedom. Let us imagine that a man has a strong desire for his wife to walk to the left, although her desire is to head to the right. If this man dissolves his desire, he will no longer resist his companion's tendency to go to the right. If this desire, which is a defect, is really dissolved, the movement to the right will be not only accepted but, depending on the degree of dissolution of the I in question, even encouraged. The man will be free of volitional conditionings and will be able to make the woman's acts converge with his determinations and decisions. He will not try to modify or repress his partner's acts but rather his own determinations and decisions, by means of the dissolution of his defects. From then on, there will be a masculine dominance, because the partner's act and the man's will are turned in the same direction. The free masculine will can be employed in the same direction toward which feminine behaviors tend. The dominance in such cases is said to be masculine, and not feminine, simply because the one who will be volitionally unconditioned is the man and not the woman. If the opposite occurs, that is, if the woman dissolves her desires and the man does not, the dominance will be feminine, because the one who masters himself is the one who has the best chance of controlling the situation. Observing everyday situations, it seems to me that women put up with men's undesirable behaviors and dominate them more than the other way around. Men are dominated and dragged by them in every direction, hooked by their own desires like a fish on a hook.

[5] But not the others.

into these traps and suffer a great deal. Since they never let us know what they feel and what they do when they are out of our sight, the only alternative left to us is to consider them "tramps[7]" and liars until they prove otherwise, if they are able to.

The sly ones hide how much they really need us and reveal it only in extreme situations, and even then as little as possible, to preserve their dissimulations. The reason is that whoever hides his emotions leaves the other without a reference point for behaving in a way that would dominate him.[8] In love relationships, our behavior is defined by the other's feelings. That is why these women reveal how much they need us only in extreme situations, under the real imminence of losing us, or when they feel that we are inaccessible. Paradoxically, they return to their initial haughty indifference when we give ourselves over after they have revealed themselves. Love, sex, and affection will be offered only as long as we do not give them much importance, receiving them as something natural that is obviously owed to us, without identifying ourselves. The reason for this is that they are tools of dominance,[9] that is, offering them is absolutely hypocritical and aims to domesticate us, tame us, subdue us, weaken us, and soften us by means of passion, so as to induce us to reveal what we feel. That is why they are offered only to the good-for-nothings[10] or to the superior men[11] who have eliminated from their souls all the shadows of passionate love, attachment, and sentimentalism.

Not knowing what they really feel for us prevents us from taking the right attitudes, having realistic expectations, anticipating their reactions, and making fair demands. We are not able to find our bearings in the relationship when we see them acting in a contradictory way. Knowing this, our delightful lady friends deny us certainty, exact knowledge, and throw us into doubt,[12] because knowledge is power.

[7] In the sense given by the Michaelis (1995) and Aurélio (FERREIRA, 1995) dictionaries.

[8] The intensely infatuated person is dominated by his desire to please the other and, in this way, does everything the other desires. When a man finds himself in this servile state, women usually say that he "is eating right out of my hand," in a direct allusion to the behavior of the docile mutt.

[9] This is what Salmansohn (1994) refers to. Her entire book is devoted to this feminine skill of training a man like a dog.

[10] Unfortunately, because the good-for-nothings have no scruples whatsoever about deceiving and, what is more, are insensitive to other people's emotional suffering.

[11] It seems to me that women tend to confuse the two types of men.

[12] It is the greater feminine emotional intelligence that allows them to run rings around us like this in the war of passion.

If you are a real man and are not afraid of discovering the worst,[13] you can test your partner's fidelity and the intensity of her love to learn the real content of her feelings. If the worst is revealed, this will simply mean that you were mistaken, that the error was yours. Be ready for anything.

They say that the Japanese hire professional seducers to test their wives' fidelity. I do not know whether we would need to go that far... however, having proof of the truth does no one any harm, and we obtain good proof of how much we are valued when we leave them free and when we ignore them, throwing the consequences of their own attitudes back onto them.

Do not let her be certain of how much you understand her games, perceive the lies, and see what is going on.

Do not tell her what you know about the feminine mind and about the means it uses. Do not expect understanding. Your problems interest no one. Do not expect compassion, pity. The only feeling you will manage to activate with this is repulsion, aversion.

Make her believe[14] that you are a wonderful guy in every sense, but hard to reach and to pin down.

Real feminine weaknesses, desires, and needs are normally jealously hidden so that we remain trapped in doubt. Doubt immobilizes, because whoever does not know the feelings and intentions of others cannot act, especially if the other's feelings are the object of his interest.

Our intellectual power to penetrate the feminine psyche, coming to know it, is feared because it reveals strategic details. It is continually blocked by means of paradoxical and illogical behaviors that apparently escape all analysis.

The more passionately in love we are, the more incapable we will be of seeing the reality about our partner's feelings. We will be afraid of reality, of discovering the worst. We will falter at the crucial moments. We will not have the courage to put them in check, to throw them into decisive situations that show us once and for all what they feel and who they really are. The infatuated man is, unfortunately, a wretch condemned to be a slave and to wear the cuckold's horns.[15]

[13] Because you are emotionally developed.
[14] Not by pretending, but by really transforming yourself.

15. The Wretched Feeling of Passion

Let us begin this chapter with the Schopenhauerian definition of love:

"Love is evil" (SCHOPENHAUER, 2004, p. 33).

Obviously, Schopenhauer is referring to romantic love, directed exclusively at one single woman, and not to universal love. When a love crisis is exceedingly intense, it can unleash an existential and spiritual crisis so deep that it leads the individual to re-evaluate his whole life and emerge renewed from this dark and dangerous passage (KORNFIELD, 1997 and GROF & GROF, 1989/1997). Unfortunately, the danger of getting lost on this journey forever also exists and is real. Crimes of passion are proof of this danger. Passionate love is hell after heaven.

What we define here as romantic or passionate love (romantic passion) is what Erich Fromm (1976) calls "neurotic love" and also "pseudo-love," one of the ills that afflict modern Western civilization, avid for possession and consumption. Still according to Fromm, neurotic love takes several forms: sentimental love, sadistic love, idolatrous love, and narcissistic love.

I agree with Fromm. Western civilization is gravely ill, and one of its diseases is romantic love (which differs completely from true and conscious love), which is obsessive and possessive. The masculine form of expression of this neurotic love is the obsessive attempts to control, watch over, and forbid the other, while its feminine form of expression corresponds to the obsessive desire to induce the other person to fall deeply in love so as to have him at her feet. In both cases, there is the intention of subjugating the other person so that he or she does what we want. This is the war of passion, and it is within this sphere that freedom from passion is suggested here. Since the whole of modern Western civilization is sick, not a few people are affected by amorous insanities.

Review your love life history and you will probably discover that the ladies you loved most (in the sense we are dealing with here, that is, passionate love) did not love you, and those who loved you most were not equally loved by you. We then infer that it is fundamental not to fall passionately in love in order to make use of the woman's passion for the benefit of the relationship. The first and fundamental capacity to be acquired is this: not falling passionately in love. Remember this above everything written in this book. Without this prerequisite, all the paths thought out here are useless and even dangerous. Do not try to put them into practice if you are in love, because the effects will fall back on you.

When we are in love, we spend immense amounts of energy trying to solve emotional puzzles, get out of labyrinths, and avoid traps. Terrible situations are created for us, and we suffer trying to get out of them in the best possible way. The result is weakening.

Passion is like alcohol. It numbs consciousness, eliminates lucidity, prevents critical judgment, and causes hallucinations, making the beloved be seen as divine:[1]

> "Sexual love is always an illusion, since it is the result of an imaginary mirage" (LÉVI, 1855/2001, p. 111).

To fall passionately in love is to fall into disgrace, to lose one's soul (ZUBATY, 2001), as happened to young Werther (GOETHE, 1774/1988). When the beloved loses the characteristics that make her attractive, she becomes uninteresting. Therefore, love, as we are dealing with it here, is malignant, hypocritical, self-interested, and selfish, because it is not directed at the other's Being or Essence but rather at his or her physical, economic, or behavioral attractions. In practice, we find that women (and men too) are in no way up to true love, despite their absurd dreams of rose-colored romances, and they do not deserve it. When they dream deliriously of romances, they are actually dreaming of themselves, because there is nothing they see beyond their own feelings. Notice that the imbecile leading men of the ridiculous feminine romances in films and books give everything of themselves and receive very little in return, at most a few bland missionary-position sexual encounters, besides a few useless kisses. This is the absurd romantic dream that infects boys and makes them feeble as adults, making them believe that they will receive love, affection, and top-quality sex if they are nice, upright, faithful, hardworking, honest, and sincere.

[1] The infatuated person is seized by a cognitive incapacity that does not allow him to see the real person with whom he has fallen in love. In her place, he sees the projection of an idealized archetypal image and firmly believes that the object of his love corresponds to his fantasy. "Being in love always brings comic phenomena to the person amid the tragic ones as well; and both because the person in love, possessed by the spirit of the species [instinct], comes to be dominated by this spirit and no longer belongs to himself." (SCHOPENHAUER, 2004, pp. 35-36)

Why does she come out unscathed after fighting with you? Why is she not disturbed? Simply because she skillfully reads in your behavior, through signs, that you are hooked, emotionally dependent. These are signs that communicate emotional dependence: jealousy, anger, sadness, curiosity about her conduct, fear of loss, being bothered by short skirts, daring necklines, etc. Instead of being bothered, simply show that you place no value on those who expose themselves to masculine desires while committed to you.

To chain the male, the sly human female gives him affection, love, and good-quality sex until she feels he is well hooked and verifies his degree of dependence with many tests. When the poor wretch is well imprisoned and dependent, then he begins to be tortured to give her the pleasure of seeing him lost and disoriented, trying to find a way out. It is a sadistic test to measure our masculine worth. They know that we greatly need the affection and fragility that they possess.

Therefore, passion or romantic love is the nerve center of the male's psychic enslavement. The main and most powerful weapon your partner has against you is your own feelings. Eliminate them to leave her powerless, or you will be thrown into an oscillating, alternating movement, exactly like the mouse between the cat's claws, like a ping-pong ball. The ladies skillfully kindle contradictory feelings in us without the slightest fear of losing us: they provoke jealousy, then flatter us, etc.

The feeling of attachment in its various facets is an effective feminine tool for subjugating the male. The various faces of attachment are infatuation, jealousy, possessiveness, longing, fondness, and the fear of losing.

To resist the feminine spell is above all to resist amorous feelings. Passion is the greatest danger and corresponds to a wretched state of servitude. In the Bible, this danger is clearly represented by the tragic fates of Adam (Genesis 3:1-24), Samson (Judges 16:1-22), David (II Samuel 11:1-27, 15:1-37, 18:9-33, and 19:1-10), and Solomon (I Kings 11:1-43).

To train our resistance against passion, the best partner is the cunning manipulator, the emotional swindler who has no scruples about toying with and destroying other people's feelings. If you are able to resist falling in love while exposing yourself to her fatal magnetism and defeat her, you will defeat any other.

The situation of the man in love is tragicomic:

When it is not yet established, passionate servitude is easier to avoid. However, once it is established, it can be removed only with great difficulty and suffering. As Nietzsche says (cited by SOUZA, 2003), the weak one and the slave are negated and destroyed within the wise man when the selective sieve of circular time acts. Of course this hurts a lot, but the prize makes up for the effort. The man becomes strong and superior:

> "Superior, in the philosopher, is whoever manages to go beyond himself and live with his limits (illnesses, suffering, etc.) without any problem. What characterizes a strong man? 'Hardness and serenity.'
> We would say, simply, that this is not very far from what we call a 'seasoned' person." (Souza, 2003, p. 44)

To resist the enchantment of passion, one must hold back the imagination (LÉVI, 1855/2001) and the mind, not believe the sly one's words, and not let oneself be fascinated by the charms of her delicate features and the fragility of her body. It is indispensable to resist the enchantment of tears and the sweetness of the voice. Skepticism, in this case, is an indispensable defense, and credulity a terrible weakness. Preserve your skepticism and deepen it. Never give wings to the first expectations and images that assail you when you see a beautiful woman.

All the feminine work I am describing consists in hooking the male through his feelings. Once he is hooked, they take him wherever they want, subjugate him, and, curiously, despise him deep down, considering him a weakling. They give themselves only to the strong men who feel nothing and resist all attempts at enchantment. It is for this reason that they never show explosions of passion for their own husbands when these are good, but only for the worst lovers. The good man is seen, from this feminine perspective, as an easily domesticated beast of burden. They decide in favor of the absurd because they are illogical (paradoxical) beings, or rather, beings who follow a logic of their own.

The feminine attempt to enchant the male is in truth a test: the one who does not surrender shows himself to be the best.

In men, the pain of passion has its origin in childhood and bears many similarities to the childhood feelings caused by the absence of the mother. It is a feeling of helplessness, of never again finding another woman like her, which is absolutely irrational, since in today's world there are approximately 3,000,000,000 women. The basic underlying idea with which the sly woman works in the masculine mind is that no other woman can replace her. This belief is continually reinforced without our noticing it, to our emotional misfortune.

The physical and psychic constitution of the woman we are dealing with here is adapted and prepared to extract physical, vital, and psychic forces from the man. They are natural vampires endowed with sophisticated energy-sucking powers.[2] On the other hand, the feminine figure is necessary

[2] According to Samael Aun Weor, every human being is more or less a witch, because he has within himself the I of witchcraft. LÉVI (1855/2001) tells us that vampirization normally occurs among human beings in all social circles, regardless of sex. However, here we are interested only in the way this interesting process takes place from the woman toward the man. While the man in love wastes away day after day, victimized by his own passion, the sly one feels better and better. Some even seem to sense the masculine suffering at a distance in an almost paranormal way. This suffering is not always limited to emotional anguish; there are cases in which the man falls physically ill or suffers accidents. What happens is a synchronous event accompanied by reciprocal, reversed psychosomatic influences: she gets better every day and he gets worse every day. Not a few men die shortly after discovering that their ex-wives have remarried. The betrayed or abandoned husband who gives himself over to alcohol has begun a suicide; the young man who shoots himself in the head after losing his girlfriend has lost his mind. Both have fallen to our virility because it excites the masculine organs and activates their energy production. It follows, therefore, that women in themselves are not exclusively good or bad for man, but can be both at the same time. From this contradictory nature, which weakens and strengthens at the same time, arises the need to dominate them[3] (in a magnetic sense, obviously, and never in an absurd sense of macho brutality) by means of their own fantasies, allowing her to live out her absurd dreams without, however, identifying ourselves with the roles we take on in these dreams. If we do not exercise dominance, in the sense already explained, they will be the ones who dominate us. Then they will look for other, stronger and more dominant males, because what interests her is the best, the strongest, the one who resists all charms and spells.[4] When we let ourselves be dragged along by the dangerous feminine magnetism in its extremely varied forms, including the romantic ones (which I consider more dangerous than brute lust), we do not accumulate energy; we only dissipate strength until total weakening and ruin.

According to Nietzsche, women detest those who are incapable of subjecting them, and the dangers of this hatred must not be underestimated:

"Let man fear woman when woman hates, because man, in the depths of his soul, is wicked. But woman, in the depths of hers, is perverse.

Whom does woman hate most? Thus spoke the iron to the magnet: 'I hate you more than anything else, because you attract, but you do not have enough strength to subject me.'" (NIETZSCHE, 1884-1885/1985)

"Behold, the world has just become perfect!"—thus thinks every woman when she obeys with all her heart.

And it is necessary that woman obey and that she find a depth for her superficiality. The soul of woman is superficial: a stormy film over shallow waters.

spiritually ill. Within women there may be a femme savant, a femme fatale, a femme fragile, and a femme vamp.

[3] See the previous notes on dominance.

[4] My hypothesis to explain this contradictory behavior, in which the woman provokes the man, challenging him to take dominant stances only to rebel against them immediately afterward, is the following: it is an ancestral mechanism of mate selection among hominid females. By challenging and provoking the male, the female wages a moral struggle with him. If the male defeats her, the feminine unconscious will say that he is a good carrier of the species' genes. If he loses and takes submissive stances, he will be considered a specimen of inferior category, useful only for functions unrelated to fertilization. By challenging him, she is in truth testing him, and the man who defeats her in this inner war will not be violating her free will but, on the contrary, will be meeting her deepest goals.

But man's soul is deep; its current roars in subterranean caverns. Woman senses the masculine strength, but does not comprehend it." (NIETZSCHE, 1884- 1885/1985)

The ladies feel aversion and anger, rather than pity, toward men who sink to the vilest level of humiliation, begging to be loved and offering themselves in obedience. The man in love despairs, clings to the object of adoration like a life raft, and becomes detestable. Although they deny it up and down, they prefer those who lead them, because they feel comfortable and secure under their protective shadows. And the man in love does not offer this security.

If you are in love, you will have to go through a painful process to reach the opposite extreme. As long as you are not immune to jealousy, able to see your partner with another guy and despise them both ironically, you will still be trapped by passion. However, being free of passion and not being jealous does not mean being a fool. You can perfectly well dismiss the woman if she flirts with someone, and being free of passion, everything will be easier.

If you suffered some serious childhood trauma that has made you insecure and incapable of resisting the poison of passion, you will have to seek psychotherapy.

Note that the cad is not jealous, because he does not fall in love. His main characteristic is to see every woman as an object and treat her as a prostitute.[5] At the same time, he is completely fake.

The man in love, on the other hand, forgives everything in the hope of being repaid with love and admiration, but his sacrifice is not recognized because, contrary to what he believes, he is seen as a chump.

In the game of passion, the female usually shows no care when she feels superior. She tends to hide her feelings to induce the other party to show what he feels through shows of care, she feigns disinterest to force the male to reveal his degree of affective dependence, etc. Whoever loves more, and with more attachment, will inevitably reveal his weakness. Strength consists in not surrendering and in being able to manage the other's feelings.

[5] This is due to the fact that the cad has several lovers at the same time and has no time to devote himself exclusively to any of them. The cad swears love and fidelity, has wild sex, and disappears, reappearing unpredictably after doing the same with his other partners. Nelson Rodrigues seems to have intuited this in his works and, although I do not agree with his position as regards morality, I must admit that he was right about much of what he wrote.

The intellectual sieve and the fatal penetration of the masculine intellect, despite its slowness, frighten them; they know that they are totally vulnerable in the absence of passionate servitude. For this reason, they will insist on trying to talk you out of your suspicions and skepticism, inducing you to surrender to subjectivity, to "let it happen," so that you get drunk on feelings. Once drunk, you will be drugged and can be led in any direction, like a drunkard.

Our little darlings want us to fall in love because this leads us to subservience, but they do not fall in love with us when we are in such a wretched state. They fall in love with the strong and unfeeling men who pay them a little attention and let them come close. Man has two functions: to love or to be loved. One cannot perform both at the same time and in relation to the same person.

To free ourselves from the dangerous weakness of passion, we have to work continually on ourselves, eliminating our defects by means of the dissolution of our psychic aggregates. Each psychic aggregate is a separate ego.

It is curious to note that when we become totally detached and leave the sly one free to reveal herself while we protect her, she feels a little loved. This is explained by the fact that they look for suckers who accept them exactly as they are and demand no change at all.

In love, the weakling pressures for affection and demands to be loved. The real man, on the contrary, offers his partner protection and takes sex as it suits him, as something obviously owed to him. Confident, he does not waver in the idea that satisfaction in eroticism belongs to him by nature. The true male seeks sex and not affection. Affective neediness is for the weak and the unmanly. A woman's love and affection are for her children and not for her males. Do not seek affection or love; seek only intense, ardent, and wild sex. Then affection and love will be offered to you. Let them come, receive them, but do not be fascinated, do not identify yourself: ignore them.

Our partners never do anything for nothing. They offer us love and affection with ulterior motives: to tame us, to check the impetus of our just anger, to make us dependent, to induce us to believe their lies, etc. That is why we must not run after this nonsense, because there is no disinterested love between a male and a female,[6] but only animal attraction. Love does not exist, much less as repayment, because we are valued only when we reject, and we value only when we are rejected.[7] In love, our acts of kindness, far from being recognized as noble acts that should be repaid in kind, are seen as signs that we are chumps and as opportunities to take advantage of other people's good faith that should not be wasted. Easterners and indigenous peoples do not normally fall passionately in love (JOHNSON, 1987), and they are quite right. For them, marriage is more an agreement and a sincere business arrangement, which should be convenient for both parties, than anything else. In this way they free themselves of many problems.

Passion is a deceptive trap:

"The deceptions that erotic desires prepare for us must be compared to certain statues that, by virtue of their position, are among those that should only be seen from the front, and so they seem beautiful, whereas from behind they offer an ugly view. Similar is what passion prepares for us: while we project it and see it as something to come, it is a paradise of delight, but when we pass to the other side and, consequently, see it from behind, it shows itself as something futile and unimportant, when not utterly repugnant." (SCHOPENHAUER, 2004, p. 53)

There is another LOVE, different from the poison of passion. But this one is difficult to attain. We see it in all the people who strive and work for humanity without demanding anything in return, such as certain philosophers, artists, and religious people of both sexes, who devote themselves with pleasure to helping their neighbor and do not seek money. This is TRUE LOVE indeed, and not the passionate poison that we are told is sublime. Romantic love, passion, sentimentalism, and attachment debase man, make him feeble, domesticate him, and unman him.

[6] Who are sexually active and at humanity's average stage of spiritual development, from which the author does not exclude himself either.

[7] Plato, in the Phaedo, states that we value people and try to keep them by our side when we lose them.

16. The Tests

The human female is essentially treacherous in love:[1] she incessantly asks the male to give himself over but, at the same time, considers those who do so feeble and uninteresting, betraying them with others who are stronger and do not love them.[2]

This treacherous amorous essence arises from the need to test masculine worth and from the duplicity of her desire.[3] The demands for surrender, as well as the recriminations and the games of jealousy, aim to test the quality of the breeder and protector of her offspring. Her intention is to verify how sure the man is of himself, of his strength, and of his worth.

Women usually test us by pretending to be disappointed with us, treating us as if we were brats, little boys guilty of reprehensible mischief, with the aim of activating childhood memories in our mind and thus forcing us to see them as stern mothers. It is also common for them to attack our points of view and conceptions, often labeling them childish, aiming to shake our morale so that we doubt our own worth. Through these procedures they will compare us to other males and will conclude that we are superior to those who wavered and doubted themselves.

Attentions and kindnesses toward other males are another type of test they use. In this way, they find out whether or not we feel inferior to other men. If we react with jealousy, they conclude that we are feeble, and this will show them two things: 1) that we believe the other man can fascinate her more than we can; 2) that we are afraid of not finding another, better female and are therefore incompetent as men. Therefore, it is necessary for us not to be jealous. But this will not be possible as long as we feel passionate love. For this reason, and for this reason only, we must totally avoid love and infatuation. Such feelings are debilitating and make a man uninteresting, even though the opposite is said.

[1] Just like the male, but in another form. I am referring here to the treacherous character contained in the act of demanding love while intending not to give it in return. It is worth remembering once again that we are dealing with characteristics of which most women do not show themselves to be conscious.

[2] In masculine betrayal, this incessant demand for the surrender of feelings followed by abandonment and disinterest is much less frequent. Masculine betrayal revolves around sexual surrender and not sentimental surrender. A man cheats because he wants sex in itself. A woman cheats because she wants to experience intense feelings.

[3] Feminine desire has two faces. One face corresponds to the desire to be fertilized by the carrier of the best genes, that is, to have sex. The other face corresponds to being preserved from everything that is unpleasant and, in general, dangerous. In this second case, the desire is to be protected, to have a provider, an emotional slave, etc. The man will be assigned one role or the other according to his profile and conduct.

The good ones are seen as feeble and insecure. Unfortunately, women love bad and strong men, without love and without feelings,[4] because it is precisely these men who convey to them the security they need (or at least that is what they feel, since that is how the feminine unconscious reads this fact). They reason unconsciously: "If I manage to attract the affection of this demon, I will be protected." That is why mobsters and powerful men have so many women. The feminine unconscious is irresistibly attracted by power and by wickedness[5] as moths are attracted to light. Of course, these guys do not treat them badly; they are absolutely fake and affectionate. They promise them heaven without ever giving it to them, and they excite their imagination. And they season the relationship with fear. Even so, a woman normally does not fear the fearsome man, because she trusts in her power to manipulate him:

> "A fragile woman can easily dominate a muscular murderer through sexual seduction, a fact that is well known to all." (PACHECO, 1987, p. 119)

That is why love is offered to the fearsome:

> Let there be valor in your love! With the weapon of your love you must confront the one who inspires fear in you. (NIETZSCHE, 1884-1885/1985, emphasis mine)

Instinctively, they sense that the fearsome man will make a good protector if he is dominated by means of seduction. LÉVI (1855/2001) wrote:

> "If the angels were also women, as modern mysticism represents them, Jehovah acted as a very prudent and very wise father when he put Satan at the gate of heaven. A great disappointment for the self-love of honorable women is to discover that the man with whom they had fallen in love is, at heart, good and irreproachable, when they had taken him for a bandit. The angel then abandons the good man with contempt, saying to him: 'You are not the Devil!' Disguise yourself, then, as the Devil, as perfectly as possible,

[4] Alberoni (1986/n.d.) says that "To achieve his goals, the seducer cannot have sincere feelings; he must always pretend." (p. 167) and adds: "Men do not understand, in general, why women feel so attracted to scoundrels, why they are so intolerant of them and so indulgent toward the great seducer." (p. 74) you who want to seduce an angel. Nothing is allowed to a virtuous man. ‘Who, after all, does this man take us for?’ say the women. ‘Does he believe, perhaps, that we have less morality than he does?’ Everything, however, is forgiven a libertine. ‘What better can you expect from such a being?’ The role of the man of great principles and unassailable character can only constitute a power with women who have never needed to be seduced [the desperate ones whom men reject]; all the others, without exception, adore bad men.” (p. 337).

[5] I defend the hypothesis that this tendency is due to an inverted perception of reality that leads them to confuse good with evil and right with wrong. Judgment becomes clouded by the invasion of instincts and feelings.

Unfortunately, experience has confirmed this many times up to the present. I hope one day to confirm the opposite.

I am not praising the behavior of the wicked, but only pointing out some characteristics of their personalities that the good, domesticated, and civilized man lacks. Being bad is as senseless and self-destructive as being good (NIETZSCHE, 1886/1998). The solution is not to be a real monster but, to paraphrase Eliphas Lévi (1855/2001), to disguise ourselves as demons as perfectly as possible in order to seduce these angelic beings.

If you think that being a nice guy is enough to be loved, change your mind. Otherwise, hell on earth will be waiting for you. If you are truly wicked, you will have many problems and a short life. Be beyond good and evil. Extract the good that there is in evil and take it for yourself. Remove the evil that there is in good and throw it away.

The psychological tortures aim to test and select the best breeder and protector of offspring, even in the case of those women who insist on saying that they do not want to marry. The most fearless, cruel, and unfeeling[6] is the chosen one. Those who fear losing their companion, who hurry to please her and submit to her whims, are considered useless for sex because they are emotionally feeble and, if they are not discarded immediately, they are marked out to perform the mere function of providers or emotional slaves.

The more you pressure her to love you, give you sex, and stay by your side, the more repulsive you will be. The point is that a woman’s dynamics are governed by the following principle: her loves are directed only at those who do not need her, preferably in no sense at all, because women want the best genes. The more you run after her, the worse it will be.

When the human female discovers a male who does not need her, her unconscious works on the idea that he is very good, very worthy and strong, that he must have many beautiful women available, etc. Then she will desire him, but the matter does not end there. The guy will be tested.

Only the tough and unfeeling pass these hellish tests. The key to this is to feel nothing, not to love, not to be in love. Then the tests will seem absolutely ridiculous to us and will not affect us. The woman will go away, wait a few days, and then come back. She will go without calling you for a long time and finally give in. She will refuse sex to the extreme limit only to then throw herself naked on top of you, devouring you. She will offer herself insistently, not out of tenderness, as you would like, but because she will feel aroused without understanding why. And you must never tell her this, obviously.

The closer the couple's relationship, the more terrible the mental hells will be and the more promising the opportunities for inner training. If you defeat the little she-devil you live with, it will be easier to defeat the others who cross your path in the future.

Owing to a certain unconscious resentment against males,[7] the insincere ones may "torment" them mercilessly, unless they are severely dominated.[8] The strategies of "torment" (Erich Fromm's sadistic love) are subtle and hard to detect, but they are normally based on the same element: submission through the passion that arises from the need for affection. Resist the charm of fragility and you will be unbeatable.

Do not let yourself be affected by crying, shouting, recriminations, and reproaches against your attitudes: such displays aim to make you doubt the [7] It is a hatred whose origins are linked to unpleasant experiences with the masculine throughout life, especially in childhood. I do not rule out the hypothesis that it is an archetypal trait activated by contact with the father. If it did not exist as a latent possibility prior to its manifestation, it would not arise in the feminine psyche.

[8] See the previous notes on dominance.

worth and legitimacy of your points of view, with the aim of testing what class of male you are.

Not only our emotional strength but also our intelligence is tested by means of fallacious and naive arguments that serve to cover up shady attitudes and little games.

17. The Stupid Social Circle

There is a very efficient way to win back an old girlfriend, an ex-wife, or simply a female who interests us: it consists in getting close to as many as possible of the people she admires and likes and who belong to that stupid circle of friends that irritates us so much. If you manage to win a prominent place in that friendly circle and, at the same time, show yourself somewhat uninterested specifically in the woman you want to win back, she will come after you.

A woman normally has an idiotic circle of friends and relatives who steal her attention and draw her away from us. In general, we feel a justified anger because these people steal her time, and often she may even end up giving sex to some imbecile from that circle, camouflaging it all as friendship. However, if we jump into this circle instead of running away from it, and win these people over, especially the most magnetic ones, we will have two advantages: 1) the woman will admire us; 2) if she, unfortunately, has already gotten involved with some suspicious “harmless little friend” from there, we can win over one of her girlfriends, preferably the closest one, and this will be a good punishment that will hurt quite a bit... Then we will feel avenged and can laugh in the sly one’s face. We will have imploded the bubble that sheltered her, removed her points of emotional support, and, on top of that, received a well-deserved prize!

18. Why It Is Important for Us to Be Decisive Men

Human females rarely know exactly what they want in the field of love, and they usually desire mutually exclusive and contradictory things. It is also common for them to contradict themselves constantly, through discrepant attitudes and words. Knowing that we are rational and that the rational mind operates with definite data, they disconcert us by creating confused situations in which contradictory behaviors mingle with the vehement denial of the visible obvious. An example is when she gives attention, care, affection, and compliments to other guys and at the same time says that she loves us and is faithful. Of course this drives us crazy, because no one can find his bearings in the middle of this confusion.

Indefiniteness causes us enormous confusion and exposes us to emotional domination. Only decisive men manage to find their bearings in this hellish labyrinth that women create in our minds and in our feelings.

Doubt and indefiniteness are precious tools for the mental and emotional manipulation of the male (Nelson Rodrigues hit the nail on the head when he said that doubt lets no one sleep).[1] They are present when we are attracted and then suddenly rejected, when we suffer the games of withdrawal and approach, when she attracts us and then runs away, when she goes without calling, when she offers and refuses sex, when she implies one thing and then denies it, in the instrumental use of jealousy, when she withdraws from the relationship while keeping hopes alive in our mind, etc.

It is advisable, therefore, to find ways of cornering the feminine mind,[2] forcing it to polarize in one direction or the other so that everything becomes very well defined and clear. All the psychological games of the sly woman have two polarities between which her indefiniteness oscillates. It is a sophisticated instinctive mental torture that aims to break the male's resistance in order to force him into the position of someone who needs but does not deserve and, in this way, induce him to run after her eternally.

We manage to corner the feminine mind so as to reverse her game and turn the tables when we are refractory and mirror-like and have mechanisms at our disposal that allow us to use her own indefiniteness as definitions, as definite and precise answers to the questions that disturb us.

[1] For Peirce (1887/n.d.), doubt creates an emotional state of irritation that disturbs the understanding and impels us to seek the relief provided by certainty.
[2] With the intention only of discovering the truth and nothing more.

Being refractory means not identifying oneself with, and not being fascinated by, the feminine figure, her delicacy and fragility, and at the same time leaving her free to be, feel, and act as she wishes while one merely observes her, trying to go deep into her soul, her thoughts, feelings, and intentions in order to understand her as realistically as possible. It also means not reacting to her psychic attacks, remaining impenetrable as a rock.

Being mirror-like means floating according to her fluctuations, alternating coldness, warmth, romanticism, distance, indifference, and ardent passion at her own rhythm. It means being adaptable and malleable like water.[3] In this way, the woman will suffer in return the effects of the circumstances she created and will be confused.

Indefiniteness, a great feminine weapon in the war of the sexes, is rendered useless when we use it as definition. For example, if you ask your girlfriend whether she is going to call you or visit you the next day and she says "I don't know" (an indefinite and very common answer) to leave you waiting like a fool, the best answer is "Then I'll wait for you until such-and-such a time." In this way, we give back the blame and the responsibility that the woman subliminally tried to throw on us, and her shot will backfire. You can do the same if she wants to go around with some little friend "who means no harm," as they say. Lay down the conditions without fear: "Then we no longer have any commitment to each other" or "So you have just authorized me to go out with another woman, whether you like it or not." Indefinite answers become definite when we take them this way.

The sly ones fear decisions and never want to take on the consequences of their attitudes, playing with indefiniteness. That is why we defeat them by handing the blame and the decisions back to them when we force them to define themselves, for better or for worse. It is curious to observe that events are indefinite only for the masculine side, because they remain absolutely aware of everything that is going on.

[3] Bruce Lee, in his philosophical excerpts, recommends that we be adaptable and malleable in all circumstances of life and states that these resemble bodily combat in many respects (LEE, 1975/2004; LEE, 1975/1984).

Only a decisive man, who does not waver but at the same time has great adaptability, can break a woman's emotional games. Never waver in your positions. If you waver, the feminine animal instinct (intuition) will immediately sense this weakness and will try to rebel in order to dominate you through it.

In love and sexual relationships, each party takes the position that corresponds to the strength of his or her convictions about himself or herself and about life. If you waver in your points of view, you will be communicating that you may be wrong in your judgments, and the only alternative left to you will be to be subjugated, for who submits to an insecure person? No one! The most confident one is the one who leads.

Always keep right on your side; never let it be taken from you. Always be fair and do everything cleanly and correctly until the moment the woman plays dirty (if she does), which may happen sooner or later. Whoever plays dirty gives the other more than enough reasons to punish him morally, humiliate him, and subjugate him (emotionally speaking, of course), and that is why you must do everything right. If you put yourself in the wrong and do wrong things (lose control, shout, curse, etc.), you will have given your partner more than enough reasons to rebel and take revenge; you will be lost. On the other hand, if she is dishonest, do not return dishonesty with dishonesty or with humiliation, so as not to stoop to her level. Be superior, unmask her fairly, and punish her morally with the rectitude of your conduct.

The difference between the effects triggered by the same attitudes taken at different moments leaves us confused, undermining the confidence we need to act decisively. Feminine unpredictability in the face of our behaviors immobilizes us, preventing us from carrying our attitudes and decisions through to their ultimate consequences. Hence the need to know the reactive patterns. The fear of loss, brother of the desire to preserve, imposes a limit on the confidence with which we make decisions.

19. How to Shatter Their Little Emotional Games

One must continually seduce one's wife, girlfriend, or casual partner. The experienced seducer knows how to dismantle each of the mental hells that are created, and he becomes master of the situation.

Feminine love and sexual behavior toward us, including the infernal little games, can be grasped through an analytical model that can be adopted for the study and understanding of any situation. This model consists of two basic behavioral traits, which sum up and make intelligible the disconcerting feminine attitudes:

1) arousing our passions, making us anxious;

2) frustrating us afterward, not satisfying the desires they kindled or allowed us to kindle, justifying themselves theatrically with true facts and data, cunningly selected and mixed with false ones to make the lie convincing.

Analyze any disturbing, conflicting, or disconcerting situation from the standpoint of this model and, if you look properly, you will be able to discover the two basic behavioral traits described above.

The arousal of our various desires is not always explicit. Often it is merely a silent permission that, because of the context in which it occurs, tells us "yes."

The combination of these two traits has the effect of irritating us and driving us mad, making us passive elements of a hypnotic process in which we are dominated by various negative feelings. They provoke us and irritate us to our limits while we stand there like fools, at the mercy of these influences. In this way, they discover a great deal about our patterns, resistances, needs, desires, fears, and weaknesses, and they turn them into instruments in their own favor.

There are many cases in which women play with men's sincerity in order to make fools of them, with the sole intention of affirming themselves through the confirmation that they can attract men only to frustrate them afterward.

They see love relationships as wars they never want to lose, and that is why they play games. Let us look at some examples:

- The woman acts as if she were interested in you and asks for your phone number but does not call. Later you ask her whether or not she is going to call, and the answer is: "Who knows...," "Maybe someday..." or else: "I don't know...";

- The woman calls you but says she only wants a "friendship"; • The crook pretends she wants to have sex with you but keeps stringing you along, postponing the dates without committing to any definite day;

- The "tramp[1]" gives you her number, you call, and she does not answer or has someone say she is not in;

- She looks at you with the expression of someone who is interested in order to draw you in and, when you approach her, she goes silent just to make fun of you;

- The sly one gives you good-quality sex for a while and then refuses, citing trivialities and justifying herself with lame excuses (it is common for married women to do this to their husbands).

Notice that in all these cases she is playing with three basic elements: contradiction, indefiniteness, and opposites. She draws you in and, when you go anxiously to meet her, she pulls away to torment you and induce you to keep up the chase only to be frustrated. The intention is to create an infernal situation of doubt so that the man is trapped by his own desire, not knowing what to do, and believes that only he wants the encounters and the woman does not. It is a dirty and insincere game in which our masculine feelings and desires are trampled. However, such a dirty game serves to select the best males: those who dismantle these games.

We must study and get to know specifically each of the forms that make up our partner's arsenal of games and learn to dismantle each one of them. It is something that is learned little by little.

[1] In the sense given by the Michaelis (1995) and Aurélio (FERREIRA, 1995) dictionaries.

The variants of the games I have pointed out are countless, reproduced daily with intense creativity, and they occur even in married life, because they are part of the natural feminine instinctive mechanism for selecting the best masculine specimens of the species. However, they usually have the three characteristics: being contradictory, playing with opposites, and playing with indefiniteness.

To beat them in such situations we need, first of all, to see them and accept them as they are, unconditionally, without any expectation, revolt, or resistance. Second, we need to have at hand mechanisms for giving them back the consequences of their attitudes, good and bad.

Reversing the positions in the game requires that we change our attitude. Instead of getting irritated by the frustrations, we have to resist the irritation and, at the same time, give the irritation back to them with attitudes that produce this effect.[2]

To tear these hateful emotional games to pieces, one way is to react in the opposite way from what is expected. Instead of insisting that the relationship deepen, we should, on the contrary, take as normal and even desirable the pole of the problem that they imagine is the unattractive one for us. Keep a card up your sleeve (an answer or reaction) in case you are rejected after being drawn in. Get ahead of her and dismiss her first, wounding her self-love and frustrating her desire to reject you. When you sense the slightest hint of rejection, instead of insisting[3], take the lead and communicate something that strikes at her self-esteem, making her feel unattractive. Be “merciless” and you will succeed. The fact is that human females behave as if they did not need males, but they do, and very much so, although they hide this fact from us. In the imbecilic little games they play, this need is covered up by a simulated behavior that conveys the impression that only the masculine party needs the encounter, the sex, and the love. Everything happens as if only the male needed the female[4].

[2] Considering that this is merely self-defense, there will be no injustice in giving it back. However, what irritates men in general does not have the same effect on women, and sometimes it may even have the opposite effect. Often the man’s simply closing up and falling silent (non-action) has more effect than a thousand words or attitudes.

[4] It was men themselves who created this situation, treating women like princesses for centuries.

In these cases, instead of fighting against the resistance, insisting in order to get a date, get sex, etc., it is better to agree with the woman and accept the facts in the opposite direction, making her take on the consequences of her joke in bad taste. Then we will discover what is really hidden behind the contradictions, and we will find out what really lies behind her emotional games. When you detect resistance, ask the woman to confirm that she really does not want the encounter, and you will see her waver, hesitate, stammer...

In these cases it also helps a great deal to announce in advance that we already know what is coming and that we will not be waiting for anything more; that is, that we have already accepted the unattractive side of the proposal for the relationship, which will be precisely the unexpected. For example: if your wife or girlfriend keeps stringing you along, promising and avoiding sex, find out how long she takes to give in and then get ahead of her by telling her: "I'm sure you'll want sex with me again in so many days." It is important that the number of days you announce in this message be greater than the number of days you actually expect, and that she think this is how long you are going to wait. In this way, the woman will have to wait all that time before she begins to enjoy the sensations of her idiotic game, and she will be disconcerted, because she will have given you more than enough reasons to trade her for another.

Unmasking the intentions and the games in advance has a demoralizing effect that empties the games of their meaning and makes her give up. Learn to foresee when your partner is going to play with your feelings and get ahead of her, unmasking the game before it actually happens. In this way, you will be temporarily free of the torments, but not for long, because others will soon come. This is far more effective than complaining, fighting, and arguing.

If your partner/wife/girlfriend is indifferent, cold, refuses sex, etc., but admits none of this, coming up with lame excuses and saying that she feels true love for you, that she is in love, etc., this game of indefiniteness is in operation. Corner her by giving her a deadline to really show through her attitudes that she loves you, and you will find out what really lies behind the game. If you are married, tell her that your wife's attitudes are giving you a free pass to find someone else. Do not feel guilty, because there is no other solution. They themselves force us to it.

Usually, in the little games there are two ways out, two possibilities: one is the outcome really desired by the manipulator, and the other is the one she does not want but pretends to want. If we agree with the resistance and amiably “push” the lady in the direction we suspect is the simulated and undesirable one, we will destroy the game. Then we will win her over or, at worst, we will discover that in fact we were only being strung along.

I have observed that the whole of feminine behavior toward men is marked by this game of indefiniteness between opposites and of frustrating alternation. All feminine manipulative behavior goes through this, through the game of contradictions. The way to destroy it is not to insist in the direction in which the woman expects us to insist, and against which she is preparing to confront us, but rather in the opposite direction, where her openness and vulnerability are total, reminding her that it is she herself who wants it that way. Obviously, you must be absolutely amiable all the time, but you will never be able to win the game if you are in love. Never forget to hold her carefully and affectionately.

Ultimately, these means of emotional defense consist in learning to corner psychologically, so as to force the real feelings and intentions to come out.

Do not try to corner the feminine intellect, because it is something practically nonexistent[5]. Corner them emotionally. How? Through attitudes that leave them no way out and that are a reflection of what they themselves did, do, or wish to do. Tell her that this or that undesirable behavior morally authorizes such and such attitudes on your part, and do not argue the matter.

He who is in love will be the loser in the game of passion, because he fears displeasing the beloved object. Since the games start with women, it follows that, unconsciously, they prefer strong, tough men who never fall in love with anyone but decide to pay them a little attention and give them a little (but not much) affection. Deep down, they are identical to the female primates of the Lower Paleolithic: they want the best male, the best ape in the band[6].

Get used to observing the emotional reactions to everything you do. This will allow you to find your way properly through the confusion and not to violate her free will. Never expect reactions that would be obvious according to the logic of masculine feelings and desires.

Provoke and manage the following feelings: fascination, attachment, fear of loss, insecurity about possessing you, admiration, acceptance, security, protection, guidance, and help[7]. Keep her from feeling: anger, disappointment, sadness with you, and resentment. Do not let antagonistic feelings mix.

There is no alternative other than indifference disguised as romanticism. What makes the relationship so problematic is the very strong need they have to see us suffering from desire and love. They want us to fall madly in love so that they can reject us. The same caresses and attentions that are offered to you will be offered to any others who seem likable to them. If you become dependent on them, believing that you are a special guy, the only alternative left to you will be madness[8].

Excite the feminine imagination and desires. Promise to satisfy her silly longings, but never satisfy them. Leave her thirsty for love; bring the water close and take it away when her thirst is about to be quenched, as she does with you. Treat her as she treats you. Prolong and stimulate indefinitely the thirst for love, affection, and understanding without ever satisfying it completely. Remember that desires end when they are completely satisfied. Do not think that she will one day take pity on you, because they are merciless with the weak. That is their nature, at least that of a good many females.

[7] By acquiring a real, not simulated, behavior.

[8] This aspect must not be neglected; it has its origin in the invasion of the conscious psyche by the anima. Sanford (1987) describes the tragic story of Mark Antony who, in love with Cleopatra, ruined himself completely. In the Bible, we have similar stories involving David, Solomon, and Samson. There are also the legends of Circe and Morgan le Fay. All these symbols warn of the dangers to which men who let themselves be invaded in the heart are exposed.

Play with dissatisfaction. However, do not take the lead in the dirty games. Everything I am writing in this book, I repeat once more, refers only to the dishonest sly ones who cheat in love in order to receive a lot and give little or nothing in return. Do not play dirty with a sincere woman, if any still exist. I have not seen them; have you? I hope so, because my greatest wish is to be wrong. Observe her, and wait until your sincere and noble feelings become the target of attempts to trample them before giving her back the counter-spell. That way, right will remain on your side.

Women give us to understand that we will be the ones who lose them if the relationship ends, and not the other way around, that is, that they would be the losers. Reverse the beliefs that the woman tries to introduce into your mind. Make her feel[9] that the loss will be hers, not yours, if the relationship ends. Embody this idea and rebel against attempts to induce you to believe that you will be the one who is harmed. Remember that there are approximately 3,000,000,000 women on the planet and that interesting men are very, very few.

What makes them so unpredictable is the contradictory character of their attitudes. In general, they try to be elusive and evasive, avoiding at all costs taking visibly definite positions (although they secretly keep for themselves the knowledge of what is going on). You will never see them behave in an absolutely coherent way. They have a horror of definite situations because they do not like to expose themselves, and they avoid them at all costs in order to confuse us. They do not want to show clearly what they feel; they want to hide what their real intentions are in order to throw us into the insecurity of doubt, the same insecurity for which they then accuse us of being weak. Doubt is preserved because it immobilizes the male. Definition, on the other hand, whether through the end of the relationship or through its continuation on our terms, puts us in a state of relief and certainty. That is why definition is continually avoided by the sly ones.

The best way out of this emotional hell is to force them to define themselves in the relationship. But we have to do it the right way so that the shot does not backfire and hit us. Here lies the crux of the matter: women hate to take on the blame and the responsibility that are theirs for spoiling relationships. If you simply try to force her to own up to her mistakes, you may come off badly. She will say that you are a cruel, perverse, oppressive guy, etc., and will end the relationship without any problem, throwing all the blame on you. She will be absolutely at peace and will tell her girlfriends about her triumph. There will be no doubt to disturb her, because "the guy was really unattractive" and nothing was lost, the decision being considered the wisest one. Instead of trying to force her to admit something against her will, simply observe, detect the strange behavior, and announce unilaterally that it is now formalized in the relationship, by her wish and not yours[10].

It all comes down to transferring and returning responsibility to whom it belongs, not accepting undue impositions of blame. It is necessary, then, to create a situation in which your partner cannot run away from herself and is forced to face herself. How do you do it? By announcing unilaterally, stressing that she, and not you, destroyed or is destroying the relationship with her undesirable attitudes, such as poor-quality sex, suspicious and indefinite conduct, or unnecessary attention to other males, etc. Warn her precisely about the attitudes you will take after each suspicious or undesirable attitude. Say this and do not argue; leave the rest hanging in the air and wait for the results. If you waver when the time comes to say it, if your voice trembles, she will go on tormenting you.

As long as they remain indefinite, the sly ones deceive us and make the blame look like ours. But what matters now in this chapter is not only our beliefs but also theirs.

You must have noticed that they rarely end a relationship in an absolutely clear and definitive way, preferring to leave the problems "hanging in the air"; even if they say clearly that they no longer love us, they let signs to the contrary show through. They do it to immobilize us in a state of anxiety, of continual waiting in doubt. To reach her in her feelings and bring about a reversal, you must take the behavioral indefiniteness as definition and announce it unilaterally, without arguing in any way, in a completely determined manner.

It is no accident that deadlines and countdowns frighten them so much. When you give someone a deadline, there is no way to evade responsibility. If you give out your phone number or e-mail, be sure to state an exact deadline for waiting for the contact, or you will be waiting forever. Exact deadlines are a powerful tool for shattering the infernal little games. They can be used in many ways. Why are they so effective? Because they allow no evasions; they corner the person and force her to take a position with no possibility of escaping her responsibilities. But the person must be informed clearly and objectively, or the solution will not work, because a feigned misunderstanding could be used as an excuse. The slightest opening for any later justification can make the undertaking fail.

In any case, if you find all this too difficult and draining, and if your partner is very refractory to control and at the same time a cheat, absolutely refusing to cooperate, content yourself at least with simply using her for whatever she is good for, pretending to agree with everything and feeling nothing. It is a good way, but it requires, as always, freedom from passion.

What matters is not so much what is communicated to the conscious mind as what is communicated to the unconscious. Pay attention to the subliminal content of conversations and contacts. Subliminally, which of the two parties is communicating that it wants, needs the other? Instead of asking “Can I see you tomorrow?” say “Tomorrow I’ll wait for you until such-and-such a time.” In the English language, the ideas of asking a question and making a request are expressed by the same word (“ask”). Except when it is incisive and hostile, a question is a form of petition and communicates submission and supplication, giving the other the chance to refuse without being responsible for anything. Objective communication within exact conditions, on the contrary, corners the other by creating a situation in which responsibility for the effects of the refusal cannot be imputed to us but only to whoever refused.

Moreover, when we ask permission for an encounter, we communicate to the other party's unconscious that we are weaker. However, no female needs males weaker than herself. From the standpoint of natural selection, weaker males are repulsive. Unfortunately, we were taught the opposite: that we should please, ask, beg for encounters, affection, sex, etc. The absurd belief was drilled into us that we have to wait for feminine goodwill and that, if we do not, the woman will "be sad and refuse us."

Get used to speaking in an imperative[11] but amiable tone. The imperative tone of voice forms a descending musical phrase, from high to low (e.g., "Come here." or "Meet me at three o'clock"). Do not argue, do not beg, do not ask permission, because women's permission is meant to be given to children and not to men.

The old, familiar feminine little game consists in approaching the male only to draw him in, pulling away when he approaches. The intention is to induce him to run desperately after her, being led wherever the female wants, like a dog after a bone[12]. To shatter it, get into the feminine rhythm of approach and withdrawal, pretending to have taken the bait, and begin to steer this movement in your favor, pulling away when she approaches and approaching when she pulls away, without fear of losing her and without changing the rhythm, only now becoming the active and no longer the passive element of the process. You must master the game without being noticed by the tormentor, who must only feel the effect without really knowing what is happening. If you proceed this way, you will create an unbearable situation, up to a point where it will leave her emotionally vulnerable, open. Then you will be able to take her for sex without the slightest resistance[13]. Usually, men approach when the lady approaches and keep trying to get even closer, desperate, when she pulls away. In this way they are stupidly manipulated without any positive result.

The "dog" can also ignore the provocations in order to induce the manipulator to come closer and then suddenly bite the bone by surprise and tear off a piece. After the woman pulls away, you can remain inaccessible for much longer than would be expected, in order to dam up the feminine libido, keeping your distance until she cannot stand it anymore and comes looking for you, complaining, at which point you surprise her by taking her by storm in your arms and devouring her sexually in every possible way. The mood will be right, and the resistance will be little or none. Then dismiss her before she recovers and forget her for a while, until the cycle repeats itself. This method is particularly effective in cases where we are considered clingy, dependent, harassing, and weak.

[12] Salmansohn (1994) teaches this wile to her female readers.
[13] I thus show how to dismantle the "Salmansohnian" training tactic and turn it against the manipulator herself.

Never abandon skepticism. It is your weapon against all the natural wiles of the feminine unconscious to induce you into beliefs that will weaken you, making you manipulable and, consequently, unattractive. Skepticism regarding intentions, words, tears, etc., is an indispensable defense.

Do not allow the belief that the woman is a “prize” to be inserted into your mind by subliminal means. Females have sophisticated natural mechanisms for inducing the male to believe that they are trophies. Such mechanisms are subtle, almost invisible, and act directly on the masculine unconscious. The games with opposites that create indefinite situations (for the male, obviously, because they know very well what is going on) aim precisely to induce and reinforce such beliefs. Their mechanisms consist basically in treating us as if they were avoiding us and, at the same time, wanted us, as happens when they purposely show parts of the body (belly, cleavage, legs) and then hide them from our gaze. We manage to shatter this mechanism when we do not look at the exposed parts, ignoring them, while at the same time addressing them in an amiable tone of protective and guiding command, putting them in their proper place, and listening patiently to their troubles. Convey confidence and authority in what you say and in the way you behave, because females like to converse looking up and never down.

Constantly keep in mind, especially in the most difficult moments, the positive and attractive attributes you possess.

Almost all the little games can be outwitted when we accept the insinuations (attempts at approach) naturally, without much surprise, encouraging them to intensify them, and at the same time remain indifferent, not letting them be sure that we have “taken the bait.” Since the need to feel desired so that they can reject us is very strong, the result is that doubt as to whether or not they have fascinated us forces them to intensify the insinuations in order to seek certainty. The result is a deepening of feminine pursuit up to the point where the indefiniteness disappears. It is the feminine desire to reject you itself that will push her toward you! The need to confirm disturbs her so much that it forces her to dispel the uncertainty by insinuating herself further. Accept these insinuations and take advantage of them, but pretend not to be very interested in sex.

Meanwhile, the situation will be favorable to an ever-greater “disinterested” approach, which must be subtle in order to preserve the doubt. When the bone is very close, bite it and tear off a nice big piece... since she treats you like a dog. In a state of doubt, anyone is vulnerable to attacks on his mind and feelings. Create and preserve a state of doubt through ambiguous behaviors. Contradictory and indefinite behavior will keep her open because of the need to confirm whether or not you desire her. Keep an “escape hatch,” a way to argue back by saying you are not interested, while you progressively narrow the distance and become more intimate.

Doubt will force her to allow you to come closer because of the need to check how far you are imprisoned by desire. If any conclusion is reached, dispelling the doubts, you may lose the game; hence the importance of not polarizing: the certainty that you are desperate with desire/love leads to loss of interest and, on the other hand, the certainty that you are absolutely inaccessible leads to her giving up. In both cases we lose the object of interest.

The provocations intensify when the uncertainty persists as to whether or not we have let ourselves be caught. This uncertainty creates in the female a need for progressive approach up to a critical point where it is no longer possible to dodge or turn back. Doubt is a state of vulnerability that forces them to insinuate themselves more and more or to accept our approach without rejecting us. Rejection exists only when there is certainty that we have been hooked, when we advance with our tongue hanging out like a hungry wolf. On the other hand, giving up occurs when we polarize ourselves in coldness, because we communicate unequivocally that we are inaccessible. Hence the importance of playing with both extremes. In other words: she must not know whether she has won or lost the game, but she must suspect that she has lost. Disturb this last suspicion with contradictory signals.

Unfortunately, we are conditioned to act in the opposite way from how we should, and we fear defeat in the little games because it triggers the loss of the desired female. Fear leads precisely to the dreaded end, contrary to what was expected!

The game of passion is a game of emotional forces. It resembles a tug-of-war in which the intention is to force the other party to reveal the real content of his or her feelings. Each party tries to enchant the other while at the same time trying to resist the enchantment, the counter-spell. The one who is most resistant and most enchanting is the victor. The one who melts easily is the loser: the weak one, the emotional one. The foreknowledge required to win is knowing exactly what to do and say in order to bewitch, to break down resistance, to induce the other into a possession by himself or herself, by his or her own desires, dreams, fantasies, illusions, and absurd longings. What matters is not the acts themselves but their effects on the other person's emotions. That is the reason why skillful manipulators ask us to give ourselves up but never do the same. Treat them as emotional con artists.

Time is a great feminine ally in the little games. Doubts prolonged over time cause emotional suffering (e.g., your partner suddenly leaves her phone off for a day or two to get you thinking about a thousand possibilities, including worrying about possible horns). We break the foundations of this game when we get ahead of her and state explicitly that we expect something a little worse than what was planned, going beyond her expectations (in the example in question, as soon as we smelled the prank, we could say something more or less like this: "I bet you won't call me for the next five days!"). A period a little, but not much, longer than the one planned shatters their plans to toy with us and usually corners them, forcing them to tell us where they are, with whom, and doing what.

Once she wins the game, the manipulator tends to pull away, keeping only the minimum closeness needed to preserve her domination. When she loses it, she insists tirelessly in order to turn the tables.

A woman needs to be struck correctly (and not just any old way!) in her feelings in order to feel the strength of the man's heart; only then does she give herself. It is no use trying to strike her in the intellect. It is no use arguing; it is no use debating. She wants to be conquered by the best and not by just anyone. It will do you no good to be tall, physically strong, handsome, or rich if you are emotionally weak, insecure, childish, or if you are scared to death of losing her, of being traded in, etc., because you will be a cuckold all the same...

Men who feel exaggerated love for women detest them in an abnormal and equally intense way for playing with their feelings:

> "Sexual love combines even with the most extreme hatred toward its object; for this reason, Plato already compared it to the love of the wolf for the sheep." (SCHOPENHAUER, 2004, p.52)

Love and hatred are two polarities of one and the same thing. They follow each other easily. The ideal is to be neutral, because both are absurd, since they are passionate[14]. See the relationship as a cold agreement from which both parties want to get the greatest advantage, giving little and receiving much.

In short, we can say that emotional little games and psychological hells are shattered by means of attitudes that send them back to whoever launched them. We need reversal mechanisms, so that the tormentors "hang themselves with their own rope," that is, fall into the very trap they invented, without our wasting energy and time on vain attempts to convince them that they are wrong, which only make the situation even worse. Such mechanisms for sending things back have two basic characteristics:

[14] "Love begins as a magus and ends as a sorcerer. After having created the lies of heaven on earth, it brings about those of hell. Its hatred is as absurd as its enthusiasm, because it is passionate, that is, subject to influences that are lethal to it" (LÉVI, 2001, p. 297)

a) A repertoire of “punishments” consisting of reflex effects of the undesirable attitudes (which should be allowed and even encouraged instead of being forbidden), that is, obvious and inescapable consequences of what the person herself did[15];

b) A set of situations that morally authorize applying them.

The best “punishments” are these: trading her for another, turning the committed relationship into an open one, or, in extreme cases, ending the relationship (never hitting, attacking, shouting, threatening, etc.). The situations that morally justify them can be of the most varied kinds and include all of your partner’s behaviors that you do not approve of. Tell her, unilaterally and without leaving room for discussion, that by engaging in this or that unacceptable behavior she will be morally authorizing you to take the corresponding punitive attitude. Then you will have cornered her. There will be no room for doubt. You will have immobilized her.

Light betrayals are also a way of playing and toying with our feelings. Never allow suspicious attitudes, faint betrayals, subtle unadmitted flirtations, and unacknowledged exposure to the desire of other males to go unnoticed, without a fitting, vigorous, and determined retaliation. Be merciless and do not forgive. If you do, your kindness will not be recognized but rather seen as an indicator that you are a sucker born to be deceived. Know how to return the consequences of mistakes “onto the head” of whoever commits them. The best way to punish betrayals is to ignore them and decide to break off the commitment. Do not waste time trying to force them to admit the obvious, because they never own up to the evident.

[15] I am in no way referring here to any attitudes that cause physical or psychological harm to the other person, but rather to the refractory attitude of simply returning, through non-action or correct reactions, the consequences of harmful acts to whoever committed them. To do so, it is enough to agree with everything and do nothing, following the course of events without stopping them, driving them along and pushing them forward until they exceed the limit of what is bearable for whoever started them. This is what Jesus Christ taught: “If thine enemy wants to make thee walk one league, go with him two.” If that enemy hurts his feet on the walk from so much walking, the fault will have been his and not ours... Was it not he who wanted to walk? These are the morally justifiable chastisements or punishments. E.g., if the woman does not want to give you attention, reject her attention; if she does not want to be faithful, dispense with fidelity; if she does not want to be together, reject her company. There will come a moment when the sly one will reach the limit and reveal how far she is capable of going in her abuses. That will be the real person you are in a relationship with.

Subtle betrayals, when they go unnoticed, work as an incentive and provide the necessary confidence for greater betrayals. We must not allow them to play with our trust, however innocent the game may seem.

The little games, as a rule, start with women. Therefore, everything must be done so as to make it evident that it is not you who are taking the initiative but your partner. It must be clear that the blame is entirely hers and not yours, since it was not you who started it all and, therefore, you feel no guilt whatsoever. Explain that you would like to have a different relationship, honest, clear, free, democratic, and egalitarian, but she did not allow it. You are merely dismantling setups, solving problems that were created for you. It is emotional self-defense.

For our partners, love is a war they can never bear to lose. They suffer terribly when they lose it. What they want is to win it. That is why they become depressed when we definitively lose our liking for them and reject them forever. This strong obsession is closely tied to the penis envy complex. It is a revenge for feeling inferior[16], since the war of feelings is really the only field in which we can be defeated. In this respect we are weaker because of our dependence on sex and love. We can easily beat them in an intellectual battle[17], but in emotional battles we usually lose. On the battlefield of passion, the winner is the one who subjugates the other, who makes the other beg on his knees for affection, and the loser is the one who pleads to be loved and humiliates himself to be near. The indifferent one, the one who rejects and avoids, is the victor. The loser is the one who gives his heart, who falls in love and has his soul stolen. The victor becomes an object of desire, is pursued, and rejects. We have to shatter this ridiculous war of nerves by conquering ourselves.

[16] Although they are not. This inferiority complex translates into a kind of shame at being women and into a marked tendency to imitate men in everything, demanding equality instead of respect for difference. In the future, it is quite possible that women will invent a small rubber penis to be worn every day under their pants, to make a bulge. They will then say that it is a “female penis.” On that day, we will no longer find women with pronounced feminine characteristics, to our misfortune.

[17] Provided that both have the same level of education and have undergone the same disciplines. I have confirmed exhaustively that women, in theoretical debates, quickly bring in emotional components in a highly effective way, confusing and disconcerting the people they are talking to. They feel much more at ease rebutting theories with disparaging and provocative remarks than with pure logic.

We tend to lose the battles because we attack and defend ourselves intellectually, through arguments aimed at clarifying obscure points, getting them to acknowledge mistakes, etc., while the ladies, on the other hand, attack and defend themselves by the emotional route, through provocations, cynicism, simulated fragility, tears, shouting, and hysterical fits. Moreover, the emotions they turn into instruments are so deep, so underground, and so subtle that we are disconcerted, frozen in the attempt to conceptualize, in order to understand, what first needs to be dug up. Our girls practice wars of nerves and of feelings from the day they are born, and that is why they are far more elusive, slippery, evasive, refractory, and indefinite than we are. When we corner them with questions, they escape by pretending to have interpreted them differently, then crying or laughing, etc. Since the emotional center is much faster than the intellect, we will always lose the wars of nerves unless we overcome them by means of a powerful will that allows us to resist absolutely every provocation and at the same time to impose our reasons and explanations without reservation in the dialogues. Negative emotions must not be allowed to enter our hearts. Let it not be us who fall into anger, jealousy, sadness, or shame, nor us who feel small, diminished, ridiculous, or afraid of losing the beloved object, but rather those who tried to throw us into such detestable states. This is a legitimate emotional defense, inasmuch as it is not we who take the initiative of tormenting emotionally the person whom, at least in theory, one loves.

Our ladies continually transfer to us the mental hells arising from conflicts in the relationship. They have sophisticated intuitive means of sensing the approach of hell and transferring it to our minds through multiple games involving doubts, admitted incontestable real facts combined with unadmitted evident truths, lies, flattery, affection, simulated fragility, etc., and, above all, responsibilities and decision-making in spheres that are none of our business.

To shatter all these games, manipulations, and maneuvers from hell, you first need not to fall in love. Second, have clear positions and communicate them unilaterally. Third, be determined to the extreme, so as to make her truly feel the consequences of her shady attitudes. Fourth, do not let her evade; create situations that leave her no way out and that force her to a definition even when her behaviors are ambiguous (taking care not to try to do it through arguments).

The little hells are rendered useless when we do not oppose the irritating behavior but, on the contrary, let it follow its own course, merely accepting and observing to see where it will all end up, where it is heading.

OBVIOUSLY, YOU MUST ALWAYS BE AMIABLE. DON'T GO BEING AS RUDE AS A GORILLA... BE SUPERIOR IN CALM AND AMIABILITY, but speak clearly and decisively. The woman will flip out in fury because of the cornering, but be superior in patience. Do not fear shouting; do not go soft at crying. Speak with infinite patience, as if you were explaining the theory of relativity to a mental defective[18], but be direct and brief. Do not follow, or be distracted by, the nonsense that is said; ignore the deceiving talk. Then you will force her to acknowledge her own dishonesty, throwing back in her face the hells and traps that had been created for you. Paradoxically, you will be seen as a man different from all the others, because no one does this. You will be considered special, superior, unique.

In general, mental hells tend to favor whoever is in a favorable position to reject the other while exempting himself or herself from blame. In this way, the entire emotional burden of guilt falls on the one who believes, even unconsciously, that he is responsible for the end of the relationship. Knowing this, our lady friends are constantly lying in wait for opportunities to induce us subliminally into the belief that we do not deserve them and that, therefore, we must be rejected for being useless and unattractive. Since it is a subliminal mesmeric process, the whole psychological network of causes and effects is unconscious.

The pain of rejection is a kind of withdrawal syndrome: the sensations caused by the loved one are absent and leave in their place a void that is filled with inner suffering. There are two kinds of suffering: inner and outer. Outer suffering is physical pain. Inner suffering is psychological pain, which is ingeniously turned into an instrument in relationships as a mechanism of domination. An emotional pain is not unreal; the proof of this is the unbearable sensation that wounds the heart when we lose someone we love.

20. On the Kind of Security They Seek

It is common to hear that women want security, but almost no one can say exactly what kind of security this is. Some men, in desperation, think it is security regarding the feelings they have for the woman, and they hurry to give them flowers, often even on their knees. They are wretches.

The masculine security they seek is not the security of the man's feelings for the woman but rather of the man about himself. The secure man the ladies talk about so much is the man who fears no one and needs no one, who does not crawl and does not hurry to please, who pleases by his mere existence. He is also the one who is sure of his goals in life, who does not give up his aims, and who knows what kind of love and what profile of woman he is looking for, making no concessions. He is a special man who does not bow to the charm of any female, who resists all spells, including attempts at conflict, at creating unfriendly atmospheres, and the infernal tests. This profile gives the female intense security. The self-assured man conveys a feeling of protection to whoever is with him.

Paradoxically, such a man must temper this security about himself by inserting into the feminine mind an insecurity about what he feels for her, making her oscillate between hope and despair, between being welcomed and the fear of losing him, just as she does, or tries to do, with him. If he lets her become polarized, he will lose her.

This security has nothing to do with giving flowers, little notes, or chocolates. Although we may do this once in a while, it is not advisable to do it all the time, so as to avoid subliminally communicating emotional weakness.

The characteristics that convey the idea of a man's security about himself are: firmness, determination, objectivity, courage, detachment, independence, leadership, insensitivity, protection, severity, cruelty (which must be directed in favor of good things and against bad things)[1], lack of pity, strength, and concentration, among others. On the other hand, the following convey to the woman the idea that the man is insecure: romanticism, sensitivity, passivity, emotionality, fragility, emotional neediness, infatuation, dependence, harassment, attachment, fear, shyness, kindness, fear of losing, and submission. The crisis of masculine values that humanity is currently going through, and that affects women so strongly, originates in the confusion of roles. The confusion, in turn, comes from the weakening of the masculine as early as childhood.

Although they will hardly admit it, observation reveals that human females seek emotionally strong men who will guide, dominate, and protect them, in the senses already so exhaustively explained in this book. It is no use being tall, strong, rich, and handsome if you do not have a brave heart. Nor is it any use being a tough guy with other men, carrying knives, and physically threatening rival males. She will get tired of you all the same, will get sick of you, and will give you horns. And it will serve you right, because you deserved it...

Another thing: never speak in a submissive tone, and do not be bossy either. Speak with concentration, from the heart, and without wavering. Use a deep tone of voice, not a high one. Do not keep asking for opinions, asking questions, giving explanations all the time, etc. Simply make sound decisions and announce them. If some explanation about your conduct is requested, confine yourself to giving it briefly and objectively, preserving the mystery. Of course, when you make a mistake you must acknowledge it and hurry to correct it before your partner starts complaining, opportunities they never miss. Women are great complainers and, if you are a softie, they will make you run after their absurd and contradictory complaints until you go completely mad. I also suggest that you never shout and that you not let her shout at you. Do not make threats you cannot carry out, and never bluff. Lose all fear. Do not consider her invulnerable. If you say you will not go after her anymore, really do not go, and kill the urge to see her inside yourself.

[1] For what we have agreed to call “evil” consists of the instinctive and natural forces of the unconscious that do not find their place in the consciousness of modern man (SANFORD, 1988). “Civilized” life does not allow the expression of all the impulses with which nature endowed us. These impulses, banished to the unconscious, will make up the shadow and will express themselves in an autonomous and compulsive form. One and the same behavioral trait will be good in its place and bad out of it.

Observe yourself in front of a beautiful woman and you will immediately discover that you are ridiculously concerned with pleasing her. You will catch yourself looking covetously at her beautiful body. You will try to be pleasant. Perhaps you will try to puff up your muscles to look like a strongman, or else smile at her nicely, stupidly believing that you will get admiration for it. You may try to make idiotic jokes, monkey around, show off money, a car, or other attributes. Perhaps you will start scratching yourself while hanging upside down from some branch... This behavior is the same in all males and will simply make you ridiculous. Instead of conveying security, you will convey the opposite. You will be pathetic and insecure. On the other hand, if you simply ignore her, you will immediately be noticed and will stand out from the rest, but this is only half the work; it is not everything. Besides standing out by not caring, you must approach without fear to establish contact with indifference, but at the same time determined to take her for yourself as something that is your due, without hesitation. Be ready to sense rejection before it begins so that you can take the lead by rejecting her first.

Men have not yet understood that woman is not the fragile being she appears to be. Precisely because of her bodily fragility, woman has refined her strategies for dominating and subjugating by means of games of feelings and the manipulation of beliefs and doubts in the masculine mind. The countless benefits and privileges that the females of homo sapiens have enjoyed in relation to the males throughout history (CREVELD, 2004) are due to this ability to awaken in us solidarity and the desire to protect and help them. Fragility is feminine strength. The only possible way to cancel out the negative effects of this strength on our psyche is not to give ourselves up emotionally. Then we make it powerless against us and we master it, directing its flow positively.

It is advisable to discover the real content of the feeling the woman has for us. To do so, it is enough to test her without fear of losing her, because, after all, if you lose her it is because you never had her, and then there is no point in being afraid.

All this demands great security about oneself, detachment, and confidence in one's own potential.

Since childhood, we have learned that we should please them so that, in return, love would be given to us as a gift. Television, movies, books, etc., drilled these erroneous ideas into us. Now we carry on with the conditioned behavior in adult life, always concerned with pleasing, with being nice, always "walking on eggshells," afraid of breaking the crystal doll. However, this is the same thing all suitors do, and it does not allow us to stand out. How could the one who does what everyone does stand out, the one who is the same in his attempt to be different? This mistake is shot through with the assumption that feminine love is a reward for masculine attempts to please.

Tall, rich, muscular, or handsome men are not desired simply for having these characteristics, but rather for feeling superior to their rivals and, consequently, more secure. As for those who are physically strong but childish, there is also the question of convenience: when they are immature, they serve well as beasts of burden and guard dogs. When domesticated by means of sex and affection, they make excellent animals, pointing their threatening, sharp horns at whomever their mistresses order. If you outdo them in security, you will surpass them and can become the master of their mistresses! Obviously, there is nothing wrong with being tall and strong (in fact it helps a lot), but there is with being stupid and childish. There are many tall, strong, sensible, mature, and intelligent men. But there are others who are not… Among several men who are absolutely the same in everything but different physically, the bigger ones will be preferred. However, strength and size are not enough, and if you are a hulk, I suggest you not neglect your intellectual and emotional development. If you are short, I suggest you invest in developing behaviors that overcome this deficiency. There is no fixed rule, and any type of man can be traded for an opposite type. I have seen rich men traded for poor ones, poor for rich, tall for short, short for tall, old for young, young for old, etc. The reason for this absence of a rule is that the unconscious feminine psyche is chaotic and drives women to continual dissatisfaction, leading them, as van Creveld (2004) observed, to complain all the time, even when all their demands have already been met.

Some are desired to be slaves, mere providers. These are the good ones, whom we could also call suckers. Others are desired to be breeding males, to mate. These are the bad ones and the cads. Still others are desired to be the absolute masters of the body, of sex, and of the soul.[2] These are beyond good and evil. Prefer to be among these last.

To convey security, get used to speaking in a tone of command. Lead the relationship; exercise protective authority. Set times and deadlines. Do not ask; inform and give orders in a manner that is not arrogant but firm. Leave her no way out when you notice any tendency to behave unpleasantly. Return the effects of negative attitudes. Do not identify yourself with the relationship, but be the head of the relationship.

Notice that the villains in stories are more confident, cold, and decisive than the good guys, but they are less intelligent, less sensitive, and less romantic. The complete man has both sides: he is the synthesis of the hero and the villain. He is superior to both because he is beyond good and evil (NIETZSCHE, 1886/1998). Be superior to the cad and to the good homebody. Study them. Keep what is good in each of them and discard what is bad.

21. Lies

Men are not the only liars, as everyone believes. Human beings of both sexes lie. Simply as a matter of focus, we will concentrate on the manifestation of this universal tendency in the women who interest us.

The intelligence of the sly ones is directed toward, and perfected in, the art of deceiving, lying, dissembling, convincing, manipulating, and simulating, with the aim of domesticating the male. This often absorbs their intelligence to the point of making them mediocre in other fields of human activity (VILAR, 1998), making them need masculine support in order to feel secure in difficult and dangerous situations. However, these women find their way easily amid the chaos of confused feelings, because the emotional aspect of relationships is the only one they pay attention to. Their judgments, decisions, choices, etc., are determined by the emotions that situations provoke and not by the objective external reality those situations consist of. Schopenhauer (2004) states the following:

[2] Let us not forget that this whole dynamic of desires is unconscious or, at most, semiconscious, which is why we should not rebel against it.

> Just as nature equipped lions with claws and teeth, elephants with tusks, wild boars with tusks, bulls with horns, and the cuttlefish with the ink that clouds the water, so too it provided woman with the art of dissimulation, for her protection and defense; and all the strength it conferred on man in the form of physical vigor and reason, it bestowed on woman in the form of this gift. Dissimulation is therefore inherent in her, which is why it suits foolish women almost as well as clever ones. For the same reason, making use of it on any occasion is as natural to her as it is for animals to use their weapons suddenly in an attack, and women feel that using it is, so to speak, their right.
> A completely truthful woman who does not dissemble is perhaps an impossibility. Precisely for this reason they easily perceive dissimulation in others, so that it is not advisable to try to use it in front of them (sic)." (p. 24)

In part, the tendency of the sly ones to avoid the truth by taking refuge in lies and illusion is due to the natural feminine disposition to conceal, a symbolic reflection of their sexual anatomy. While the female sexual organs are internalized in the body, the male ones project outward. It is no accident that we feel pleasure in showing our "phallus erectus," in exhibiting it, while they feel satisfaction in the opposite act, in concealing the vagina by closing their legs or covering it with their hands. If they notice that this bothers us, that we are dying to see what they are hiding, they get even more excited and hide it more. For the same reason, we want to make them open up, spread themselves completely open, in the sexual act and in their emotional life, because this is a victory over the resistance of the heart. We want them to turn inside out and show themselves.

Men have only a story when they lie[1]. Women have a story, tears, dramatic scenes, and simulated indignation when we do not believe their lies. Do not be moved by crocodile tears. You will never really know whether that lame excuse for something poorly explained is the truth or a lie. You will never be sure whether that melting does not hide an attempt to manipulate you into giving yourself up. Therefore, never believe anything.

[1] There is a limit to the ability of human beings, including those of the female sex, to bear and express reality in acts and words. Beyond this limit, lies reign. However, as with almost everything in life, we are much more unconscious than conscious of this tendency. In this chapter we are dealing with the feminine form of expression of the universal human tendency to lie.

Through falseness and lies, the weakest males, that is, the easiest to convince and tame, and the strongest, who believe nothing and scorn all attempts at deception, are identified and marked for the functions that correspond to them by vocation.

Generally, it is not advisable to run after lies in order to unmask them. The drain on energy can be high, and the little witch's satisfaction will be complete when she sees you being manipulated like an imbecile. Prefer to accept them and encourage them up to a point so untenable that it becomes ridiculous, making it evident that you always knew everything and never let yourself be deceived, or else up to a point where that lie becomes useful.

It is not advisable to assault their nature by trying to force them to be sincere. It is best to accept them as they are and take advantage of the situation:

> "Women above all, who are essentially and always actresses, who like to impress themselves by impressing others, and who are the first to be deceived when they play out their nervous melodramas, women—we repeat—are the true black magic of magnetism. Thus it will be impossible for magnetizers who are not initiated into the supreme arcana and not assisted by the lights of the Kabbalah always to master this fleeting and refractory element. To be master of a woman, one must distract her and deceive her skillfully, letting her suppose that it is she herself who is deceiving. This advice, which we offer here especially to magnetizing physicians, might also, perhaps, be useful in married life." (LÉVI, 1855/2001, p. 225)

When we accept attempts at deception and pretend to believe the lies, or when we pretend to want exactly what we do not want in order to be contradicted, this anti-manipulation defense is in action.

Accept being "put one over on" consciously a few times. Although it seems like a weakness, it is a strength that few possess. Let her think she is deceiving you. The need to lie and deceive is inherent in sly females and is part of their instinctive selective strategies for mating[2]. Superior males regard such attempts at trickery and deception as silly, childish games that in no way belong in their lives: they see them as a problem that is not theirs. Then the women seek them out without knowing why. The males who are emotionally affected by this show themselves to be weaker and tend to be traded in. The one who tries least to deceive you should be the most suitable for a stable relationship.

It is difficult to find women who can bear the weight of the truth:

> "Even considering that there are kinder women, they hardly want to displease anyone by telling the truth, because the truth often shows the harshness of human madness." (PACHECO, 1987, p. 76)

Rebelling against other people's inevitable lies is a weakness. Rebel against the lies you have told yourself and against your naiveté in believing in enchanting feminine magic.

It is extremely difficult to accept lies and attempts at deception from someone we love. Once, a friend of mine discovered that a woman he loved very much was lying on the phone. He detected hesitations and inconsistencies in her speech that clearly indicated something strange was going on. He felt unbearable pain because, until then, he still believed in human beings, particularly in women. He fought in vain against the pain of being deceived, without any result. He was desperate.

Suddenly, he discovered that the pain came not from the lie itself but from his inability to accept it as such. Then he understood that we have to accept lies as inherent in human nature, including feminine nature. And more: we have to accept the fact, when it is incontestable, that our noblest, purest, and most sublime feelings will be trampled on and scorned. The suffering came from several mistaken assumptions and expectations on his part regarding the opposite sex. When he discovered them, he felt great relief. The woman he liked was there, most likely with another guy; she had just called putting on an act, and he had simply accepted the fact and ignored it, regarding it as something that was none of his business. And in fact it no longer was.

[2] For in this way they, or rather their unconscious, discover who the most intelligent ones are, those who do not let themselves be deceived, and select them.

We nurture many false expectations regarding the female sex. They are expectations that were drilled into us from childhood and that only do us harm. We have to tear the root of evil out of our hearts. The main root is passion, but there are many others.

There is in the female sex a continual pleasure in deceiving and dissembling in the field of love. Amorous deception gives them satisfaction[3]. I cannot state that this is universal, but I am sure it is a frequent characteristic. Therefore, skepticism is man's greatest weapon for defending himself, and credulity his greatest weakness. Cultivate extreme skepticism and beware of credulity.

Women are usually very patient in inducing credulity. Always resist and, on top of that, encourage them to lie even more. Pretend to believe, unmasking them only after you have in hand several proven lies with which to surprise and unmask them. Never let her know whether or not you are aware that you are the target of attempts at deception.

The study of feminine lies and of the corresponding behavioral patterns is usually very useful. But to do so, we have to accept lies as they are, without rebelling.

A notable lie that does a lot of damage is that companionable, sensitive men are desirable and drive women wild. Observation reveals that such men are in fact tiresome because they do not provoke intense emotions. Victimized by this lie, many men try to fit this deceptive pattern of the ideal man and are astonished when they get results opposite to the ones they were aiming for.

Never forget: they lie when they describe the ideal man.

[3] In men, this tendency to deceive one's neighbor occurs less frequently in the field of love and more frequently in other fields.

22. Infidelity

Infidelity is a universal characteristic. All human beings, including those of the female sex, are unfaithful, even if they are not at all aware of it. Let us now look at how infidelity takes on a feminine form of manifestation.

In present times, the situation is serious. It is very hard to find partners who are any good for marriage. Many women are acquiring the habit of exposing themselves to betrayal in subtle ways, facilitating it through ambiguous, innocent-looking situations, which they usually describe as “meaning no harm” and which confuse us completely when we are not experienced enough to unmask them. Such situations are in fact the beginnings of involvement with other males or, at the very least, of voluntary and conscious exposure to their desires. Because of their ambiguous character, they provide unfaithful women with a comfortable refuge in which to expose themselves and camouflage their true intentions, confusing their partners and dodging their possible and just anger.

An effective camouflage for feminine infidelity consists in playing innocent, pretending not to notice or understand the meaning of certain acts that unequivocally betray subtle infidelities[1]. The immediate effect of such acts is to provoke doubts in our minds that very effectively hinder unmasking them through accusations, driving us mad in the midst of the confusion. The obvious and the evident are denied to the very last moment. Hence the importance of not wasting our time trying to force them through arguments to admit the shady character of what they do, and of confining ourselves to announcing unilaterally the attitudes we disapprove of and the consequences they entail, then resolutely taking the appropriate measures.

The reasons that motivate them to get involved with us are many, and not only love, as they usually claim falsely. Generally, love is the last of the reasons for which they enter into a commitment, an engagement, or a marriage. Let us analyze this more closely.

Husbands/fiancés/boyfriends serve only to provide material and/or emotional support through the subservience of infatuation. This is the reason why they are not normally loved and must be sincere, honest, and hardworking. Present-day wives will not infrequently prefer to truly love insensitive men who are not their husbands. In modern Western society, marriage is an almost bankrupt institution, in a rapid process of extinction. I know several women who married one man while truly loving another. They do it with complete naturalness, as if this unspeakable crime against true love were absolutely legitimate and just. They do not see it as an aggression against the love of the soul.[2] Schopenhauer (2004) states the following about marriage:

> "To marry means to do everything possible to become repugnant to each other." (p. 62)

> "Most men let themselves be seduced by a pretty face; for nature induces them to unite with women by showing at once their whole brilliant side or letting the 'theatrical effect' do its work; but it hides the many evils that they consequently bring, among them endless tasks, worries about children, stubbornness, whims, aging and ugliness after a few years, cheating, the planting of horns, restlessness, hysterical fits, lovers, hell and the devil. For this reason I describe marriage as a debt that is contracted in youth and paid in old age." (p. 67)

It is worth remembering that adultery satisfies a feminine fantasy (CALIGARIS, 2005 and CALIGARIS, 2006). Husbands, in our present-day society, have three purposes:

1) to provide material and emotional security;

2) to be shown off to society, especially to rival females, as proof that one has not been "left on the shelf";

3) to wear horns.

Let us now deal with this last function.

In general, marriage is a trap for the man (SCHOPENHAUER, 2004). After being drawn in, hooked, and caught, the husband serves certain desires of the feminine unconscious, the main one being the fantasy of being a mixture of courtesan and defenseless princess awaiting a knight. It should be noted that outbursts of passion and libido usually happen not within marriage but outside it. And one of the reasons for this is that the wife needs to feel like a princess abducted by a villain or a dragon. The lover, then, embodies the archetype of Prince Charming, of the knight who rescues her from pain, suffering, and imprisonment. Obviously, after the princess marries the prince, he turns into a husband and, therefore, into a new villain, and the cycle repeats itself. The intense emotions of adultery, or of the betrayals in novels in general, are provided by the husband/boyfriend/fiancé, with his constantly threatening presence, and not only by the lover himself, as it seems at first sight. That is the reason why the lover, when he marries the adulteress, stands a good chance of later being betrayed by her. Once he is married, the roles change, and the feminine fantasy can no longer be satisfied without a new extramarital passion.[3]

These ladies prefer deceiving their husbands to acting honestly by telling them that they feel attracted to someone else. They do it so that the emotion of passion with the lover will be more intense because of the risk arising from the prohibition, and also to preserve the benefits that marriage gives them. They avoid owning up to their promiscuity in order to dodge the consequences this would bring about. They want to add to their matriarchal nest as many males as possible, in a hierarchical scale defined by the intensity of the passions each one arouses. This is a prehistoric inheritance that runs counter to the patriarchal tendency, equally rooted in a remote past.

To justify to themselves the fact that they are interested in someone else and so not feel like worthless traitors, the "tramps[4]" will try to force you to take on one of two roles: that of the violent tyrant or that of the indifferent husband who "doesn't pay attention." Stay alert and do not accept it.

Since they want to collect the best genes, they are usually dissatisfied with the partner they have at their side and sighing for others who are above him in the masculine hierarchy. We, going the other way, fight to preserve our genetic inheritance by ruling out every possibility that our partner might be impregnated by anyone other than ourselves. These instinctive tendencies move them to deceive us in order to expose themselves to desire, and at the same time make us extremely careful. Therefore, it is absolutely normal that we do not want anyone near our territory except those we authorize. Do not be ashamed, and do not accept being told that you are jealous or insecure when you want your female to keep her potential rivals a hundred kilometers away. Do not accept for no reason, without satisfactory explanations, that she let males come close. It is a legitimate masculine right.

[3] Caligaris tells us that women have an unconscious need for total sexual surrender but are repressed by fear of the husband, who symbolically represents the restrictive figure of the father. According to her, this would be linked to the act of prostituting oneself and to adultery.

The absence of any action to drive away suitors who subtly show their intentions indicates that the woman is enjoying being desired, because, if this were not so, she would send them running. The means they have of discouraging any undesirable suitors are many and, if they do not use them, it is simply because they do not want to. To justify their inaction, they usually plead innocence, pretending not to understand[5] what is going on and what the suitors' intentions are.

At a certain risk of losing her, you can unmask her by identifying and pointing out each of the shady and unacceptable attitudes. Examples of attitudes your woman must not have with other males, because they indicate disguised exposure to desire: greeting them enthusiastically or with a smile, whether or not she takes the initiative, when there is no need whatsoever; making gestures to be noticed, being kind, being unnecessarily friendly, complaining about her troubles, dancing, offering or asking for a ride, talking about herself, badmouthing you, etc. For each of these shady attitudes, establish a corresponding and morally justifiable punitive consequence[6].

In general, every unnecessary initiative of contact with men indicates some interest, however subtle, in being desired. If your partner does this, she is potentially an adulteress, and you are probably a cuckold. So be careful. Force her to take on the consequences of what she does. And in this case, the consequence of flirting covertly with other males is to be treated as a "tramp[7]" and as an object, with no emotional commitment at all. This is the "punishment."

[5] See the earlier note on feigned misunderstanding.

[6] See the earlier notes on punishment.

[7] In the sense given by the Michaelis (1995) and Aurélio (FERREIRA, 1995) dictionaries.

Nowadays, marriage is more and more a partnership in which the husband puts in the labor and the wife puts in the horns. The promise to give good-quality love and sex is never kept. There is no advantage in being married:

"The usual goal of the so-called career of young men is none other than to become a woman's beast of burden. Among the best of them, woman appears as a rule as a sin of youth" (SCHOPENHAUER, 2004, p.86)

The situation today is no different from the one that existed in Schopenhauer's time. Experience shows that good, honest, hardworking men are usually considered dull and flavorless, and they end up sharing the female with males considered more interesting while they fulfill the function of giving material support, of providers. In other words: they buy horns believing they are buying love. The horns are the payment for the subservience that comes from giving one's whole heart. And on top of that, the blame is usually thrown on the husband himself:

"Many women express the idea that their husbands are not skillful enough to stimulate them sexually; 'that there ought to be a man who, perceiving her great worth and loving her as she would deserve to be loved, would know how to draw immeasurable pleasures from her depths'" (PACHECO, 1987, p. 48)

Obviously, this is nothing but a lame excuse to justify adultery, giving it an ineffable and sublime appearance, and also a wile for imputing to the man the blame for the woman's sexual incapacity and lack of interest.

We are not judging the fact that a woman flirts with or has sexual relations with several men. Such behavior is none of our business and is not our problem. It is not up to us to judge other people's behavior, except as regards the emotional harm it may cause us. We are in no way interested in suppressing other people's freedom or violating feminine free will. Of course the woman has every right to do whatever she wants, as long as she acts with sincerity. The wile denounced here consists only in deceiving, dissembling, and pretending to be a saint in order to enjoy the benefits a monogamous woman would deserve (something rare nowadays), and in wanting to induce us to believe that visibly compromising behaviors are innocent, underestimating our intelligence. The problem lies in amorous cheating and not in the fact that a woman changes partners or keeps more than one relationship at the same time. The sly ones do this to avoid the bad consequences of their own actions and to enjoy the intensification of emotions in carrying out a forbidden act.

Faced with undesirable behavior by your partner toward other males, try questioning her resolutely, two or three times, staring her straight in the eyes, about the propriety of that behavior, and asking her to accept the undesirable behavior as something normal for the relationship. Then you will see her dodging at all costs.

In the field of feminine fidelity, do not count on common sense, and do not expect understanding of the noble reasons that make you want her to keep away from other males. In spite of everything, your partner, if she is the sly one we are dealing with, will always refuse to acknowledge the obvious in her own attitudes. What they want is just a sucker who will accept them exactly as they are, with no concession, adaptation, or change. Therefore, the only alternative left to us is not to love them as we would like to. Forget this beautiful dream, and remember that women are absurd by nature in our eyes.

I have often seen them applying ingenious psychological mechanisms to expose themselves to the desire of several males without being held responsible.

Do not accept the very common insinuation that you are insecure when you demand care about the way your girlfriend or wife treats other men. It is a wile to deceive you and dissuade you from your purpose and your skepticism. Behind this cunning insinuation lies the subliminal suggestion that we compare ourselves to other males and feel inferior, implying that our concern not to be deceived is not legitimate. This idea hides the fact that the distrust, the doubt, the lack of security, and the concern refer to her attitude and not to a possible "superiority" of other males over us. Obviously, the smart and careful man (whom they call "jealous") is not insecure about his own worth but about his partner's sincerity and honesty, because we do not want to fall into traps set by "tramps[8]." To shatter this mental system, use your intellect to break down all the feminine arguments without pity and without fear of losing her. Do not waver in your masculine position, or your doubt will be sensed and you will go on being tormented. Moreover, this ingenious unconscious stratagem also serves to reveal whether you are stupid, falling into the trap, or intelligent. If you give up and let yourself be persuaded, you will be revealing that you are a male of an inferior category. If you see through such a game and scorn it, you will be showing that you are a superior male.

The insincere partner will demand to be accepted as she is, without any change, but she will never do the same for you. This means that your sexual rhythm as a man and the discomfort caused by her male friendships will never be taken into account. Regardless of any reason, she will ride roughshod over your feelings and will not accept you as you are, with all your cares, needs, and concerns as a man. On top of that, she will say that she is friendly and kind to other males because she does not want to be rude, that you are wrong to want exclusivity and that you should agree with everything because "there's no harm in it at all," that good-quality sex every day is excessive, etc. In this way, you will never really know whether she is a virtuous woman or a two-faced "tramp[9]." By stirring up distrust and simultaneously denying any possibility of flirting with someone else, the woman immobilizes us by means of the doubts cast and kept alive in our minds.

Women feel the need to hide continually in indefiniteness, creating and maintaining situations in which only they know whether or not they are betraying us. An experienced man draws conclusions from the attitudes he sees and does not let himself be moved for no reason by words or tears.

Do not commit yourself to women who are unnecessarily friendly, nice, or kind to males, because they are potential adulteresses. Demand proof of fidelity and do not be content with mere words. As a precaution, be like the Chinese: consider them sly ones until proven otherwise. They do the same with us; they believe we are all good-for-nothing crooks and cads. Remember that your partner always demands proof of love and never simply believes what you say, so why believe her for no reason without proof? The rights are equal, aren't they?

The infidelity of our lady friends is closely tied to their failure to be happy in marriage. Since they are incapable of seducing and marrying the loves of their lives, they end up resigning themselves to marriage with the few men who are available, in order to use them and obtain material or emotional benefits. For this reason, these wives generally feel an aversion to their husbands and refuse to be always close by, ready to attend to them, as would befit virtuous partners. They give them the minimum of affection and sex. They also do not like to account for where they go and with whom, offending against honesty and transparency. Therefore, the only solution is to keep temporary relationships, discarding them immediately as soon as their expiration date has passed. Here is one more reason not to fall in love.

If you are really strong and free of passion, you can test her fidelity as some Japanese men do, by encouraging her to betray you. If the encouragement is accepted, you will have discovered the woman's real character and will have lost nothing.

23. Childishness

Human beings, including those of the female sex, retain many characteristics of childhood in adulthood. This is called neoteny:

> "Evolutionary modifications involving the retention of infantile stages are called neoteny. The origin of the chordates is probably the result of a combination of caenogenetic and neotenic processes, since it is generally believed that they arose from a larval echinoderm, and it is almost certain that the shape of the human head originated through the retention of the fetal form. There are in fact many 'infantile' human structural characteristics, and they may have originated through neoteny. For example, the retention of the curvature of the skull, the anterior position of the foramen magnum, the flattening of the face, which in turn is always smaller than the braincase, and the absence of hair on the body." (Harrison and Weiner, 1964/1971, p. 29)

Let us see how this takes on a feminine behavioral form.

Philosophizing on the basis of this scientific precept and comparing it with various observations about human behavior, one can conclude that neoteny is not limited to the physical body but also covers the psyche and behaviors. My point of view, provisional and subject to change as always, is that neoteny is more pronounced in the female sex than in the male, although it is not absent in the latter. The fragile body, the fine features, the high voice, the delicacy of manners, etc., make a woman more like a little girl than a man is like a little boy, and they make her presence very pleasant to us (especially if it is not accompanied by emotional hell-raising). This resemblance to children awakens in us solidarity and the desire to protect them so as not to let them suffer. This in itself is not bad, unless it is turned into an instrument by the sly ones as a weakness through which to take us, weaken us, and manipulate us. Anyone with experience knows that, by talking like little children, women soften a man up and calm him down. It is a strategy that can be used for good, in the case of a woman who is virtuous and honest in her feelings, and for evil, in the case of the selfish manipulator. The frequency with which it is used for evil is not small.

Being considered pleasant because one resembles a child should not be considered an offense, unless the supposedly offended person is prejudiced against children, who are beautiful inside.

Women are very similar to children in their habits, their tastes, and even in their fragile physical form. They like candy and chocolates. They constantly play with our feelings. Here there is a subtle difference, because a child does not play with someone else's sincerity unless it has been taught to, while the sly ones do it with ulterior motives.

Try to see them as mischievous children, always staying alert but not giving importance to their silly little games. However, do not forget that they are not really children and can be cunning and even dangerous, in some cases. They are similar to certain tormenting mythical beings that are not evil but do not distinguish things very well either: sacis, caiporas, curupiras, iaras, mermaids, etc. Although they are not really children, they want to be treated as such when it suits them:

"Many women think they are like children—they think they can do whatever they want and that society is obliged to accept them and put up with them.

This happens largely through the fault of the individuals who have been feeding this absurdity, fearing they will cause greater problems if they stop supporting them. But it is precisely the opposite. If everyone acted the same way, pressing women to be more mature and to own up to their mistakes as men have to do, we would have a great improvement in society in general [including the field of love, the subject of this book].” (PACHECO, 1987, p.58)

I confess that I am skeptical about the possibility that all men might one day act as Cláudia Pacheco suggests above. It would require of them a victory over themselves that would be unique in history.

Regarding the childish attitude of feigning naiveté, purity, and saintliness, we must understand that we are all to blame, since we have always tolerated their pretending to be what they are not:

“Woman has been protected by a [false] ‘halo’ of saintliness in homes and in society. Called the ‘weaker sex,’ defenseless, a symbol of affection, fidelity, and self-denial, she was spared from having to suffer awareness of her pathology, which is immensely serious. This is what finally sank woman. Alienated from her problems, she went into decline day by day, without working on the awareness of her mistakes, which have long gone uncorrected.” (PACHECO, 1987, pp.42-43)

Because of this, the negative aspect of feminine childishness has become even more serious, to the point that many women think they can do whatever they want with other people’s feelings, particularly men’s. At the point things have reached, there is no alternative but to accept this childishness and give them back the unpleasant consequences, in the hope that one day they will wake up.

Outside the field of puerile little games and selfish emotional opportunism, sly females have little discernment about life and cannot clearly identify the differences between good and evil in the field of relationships. They constantly confuse right with wrong because they try to define them by emotional criteria. The more coherence you demand of your partner in this case, the worse it will be. The best thing is to take unilaterally the position most consistent with her profiles and vocations and in this way force her to polarize herself. Chasing after what they say is failing to recognize them as absurd.

Betrayals and emotional hell-raising should be seen as childish pranks and not as tragedies. It is no accident that some occultists compare women to elementals (gnomes, goblins, fairies).

Do not see her as inferior or superior to you. See her as a different being, but sometimes (not always, because not all of them are) cunning and envious.

24. Observing Them Realistically

Many of Machiavelli's precepts (1513/1977; 1513/2001) are valid in dealing with women: being at the same time loved and "feared" (respected), doing good little by little, "punishing them" (returning consequences) all at once, not seducing the wives of other males so as not to make unnecessary enemies, etc.

You will be loved only on the basis of the emotional suffering you give back. Do not love her passionately, but treat her well. Learn to reach her in her emotions.

For a woman to admire us, we need to "wound" (strike) her correctly in her feelings so that she feels the power of our will and determination. The fear of displeasing and of losing reveals weakness, and a man must take every care not to be taken for a weakling, because weaklings are unattractive.

Learn to observe the feelings your attitudes, gestures, and words provoke. But beware of your partner's skillful simulations.

A woman does not know much about herself. Do not take your bearings from the idiotic masculine profile of the heroes of love movies and romance novels, nor from the type of "interesting man" that women describe. The man who dominates them[1] emotionally does not correspond in any way to what they say. In fact, such descriptions only serve to draw the weakest men into subservience and mark them for rejection, since these imbeciles hurry to try to fit into those stupid models. In general, what strikes them in their emotions and makes them fall in love is precisely the opposite of what we hear them say all the time. Hence the importance of not being afraid of losing them, so that we can contradict them at will.

The so-called feminine love, freely offered, is selfish because it does not take into account the emotional suffering it causes. It is absolutely calculating in its purpose: to select the male most resistant to the fatal magnetism of females. It is garbage; reject it.

Feminine understanding in a couple's relationship usually comes after the emotional impact of events, not before. Hence the uselessness of attempts to argue. They are reached a posteriori.

Do not try to reach them with logical arguments but rather with the emotional impact of your words and conduct. Pay attention to the feelings your words and conduct provoke. The element that guides them will be feeling, not linear rational logic. The opinions they adopt, the ideas they defend, the value they attribute to things, etc., are due to the emotions provoked. The same holds for the value that will be attributed to their partner. You will be considered a man, a crybaby, a demon, a Prince Charming, a frog, a servile dog, or a rat according to the feelings you provoke and not according to the reasoning you set off. However, this does not mean that imagination will not be at work. Do not try to make them reason; accept them as they are. Be adaptable and malleable; have no form.

Do not expect sincerity. Whoever needs affection and love to be happy in a relationship is a wretch, in my view (obviously, you do not have to agree!). The noblest, most sublime, and most altruistic intentions are generally trampled and go unrecognized. The human being is asleep and moves about in incoherence and ingratitude.

If you are suffering at the hands of some lady, this simply means that you are not seeing the real content of the relationship. Your suffering is arising from infernal behavioral contradictions. They are very skillful at deceiving and disguising what they really want, do, and feel. Watch her in action and discover what she really feels and wants. If she does not give you good-quality sex, and often, if she does not show up for dates, if she keeps postponing the commitments she has made, if she does not call or offers unconvincing justifications for her absence, these are unequivocal signs that the relationship is superficial and good for nothing except casual and widely spaced encounters. Regardless of what she says, it is the facts and the attitudes that show the truth, and we must always yield to them.

Because they feel inferior, our fatal little lady friends feel great satisfaction in knowing that they deceive us by hiding their intentions and feelings. It is a kind of unconscious revenge for not being able to surpass us in any field other than that of emotional resistance against passion. It is the symbolic penis envy. If we surpass them in this field, we surpass them in all the others.

Emotional resistance makes us able to accept lies and attempts at deception naturally. It is a strength and not a weakness; cultivate it.

She will not love you for free. She will love the intense feelings you can provide. Reject the false love that is offered to you for free and wrest from the feminine soul the love reserved for supreme moments. This is true love: the love that is normally refused us but is given when the sly one is in despair at having lost the man of her life forever.

Our hope that they will always be affectionate is vain. Equally vain is the hope that they will confirm through their attitudes the fidelity of feeling that they demand so much of us and proclaim they have.

When we study and understand the dark aspect of the feminine, we create against its fatal magnetism a resistance that comes from aversion. It is a resistance similar to the one they have against us. This resistance protects us and allows us to enjoy the pleasures of sex and love without risk.

When we put them first in our lives, we are considered suckers, smothering, repellent, and clingy. When we put them second, we are accused of “not paying attention.” This means that it is no use worrying about pleasing them and that love, as it is normally understood, is nothing but nonsense. There will always be some invented excuse to justify and hide the real fact that we are not needed outside a utilitarian context.

Their capacity to displease us without fear of losing us is remarkable. They do it because they know exactly the limits imposed by our needs and attachments.

25. Binding Them to Us Through Their Feelings

A woman does not soften or bend in response to a man's affection. Nor does she bend in response to brutality. To reach her and make her dependent, you must first of all give her security.

Your partner does not need affection and love first and foremost, but rather your power to protect her. Try offering only affection and love and you will see them trampled and rejected. If we are very (and only) affectionate, we will be seen as second-class males, incapable of giving protection. Be firm, speak in a deep tone of voice, treat her like a little girl. Exercise a protective authority and take command. Forbid unnecessary contact with other males or, if she resists, release her once and for all into a relationship with absolutely no commitment for either party. Do not allow the sly one to remain in indefiniteness. Do not be afraid of losing her. Be affectionate constantly, but not only affectionate.

We are currently living through a terrible crisis of masculine values. Men have become demasculinized, turning sensitive, romantic, sentimental, and clingy. Women sorely miss masculinity. This is where we must take hold of them and bind them to us.

Sentimentality, passion, attachment, romanticism, affectionateness, and sensitivity are feminine attributes. On the other hand, coldness, impetuosity, objectivity, firmness, cruelty, pitilessness, calm, determination, and security are masculine values. Such characteristics can be used for good or for evil. If you use them for evil, oppressing and exploiting your partner, you will be detested and you will wear horns. If you employ them for good, giving protection and guidance, you will receive love and fidelity. Use your masculinity for good. Emphasize the masculine in your nature in a conscious and directed way so as to completely master the situation.

Be passive in the relationship and you will also wear horns. Be active for evil and you will be betrayed just the same. Be active for good—firm, dominant, guiding, leading, protective—and you will have a great chance of receiving love, good-quality sex, and fidelity.

While remaining unattached and free of passion, give affection, protection, and care (but keeping your distance) to make her dependent, as she does with you. Do what no other man would do and become special. That way, her fear of losing you will be greater when you distance yourself in retaliation for some mistake (as happens with you when she distances herself to punish you). Furthermore, have ardent and wild sex, with no fussiness, no sentimentality, and no fear of impressing her. Females, even the anorgasmic ones, need to feel that they are desired.

Cars and material possessions are not the only things that make the female dependent: care and protection do so as well. Compensate for your poverty and other deficiencies with distinctive behavior, superior to that of all other males. If you go about on foot, are poor, ugly, scrawny, fat, short, or potbellied, and if this cannot be remedied, look for other attributes through which you can develop. Be unique and superior in everything you can.

Be capable of disliking your partner and at the same time caring for her as no other man would.

To bind them through their feelings, it is essential to establish the right kind of sympathy. The mistake most men make is to suppose that erotic sympathy will arise from hurrying to please and impress or from the fear of hurting her tastes by displeasing her. In the case of women, what actually happens is the opposite: sympathy for sex originates from a stance that is affectionate but active, protective, firm, distant, mysterious, and leading. Be the head of the relationship, the boss, the leader. Do not confuse erotic sympathy with friendly sympathy.

Females like to look up when they talk. It is no accident that they like big men: they would give themselves to men fifteen or twenty meters tall, if such men existed. They want to be carried, to feel small. But there are several ways for us to be big, and not only in bodily stature. There are tall and short men who are stupid and childish; others are inert, lacking initiative. Such attributes have nothing to do with size. If you are tall, that is an advantage and should be taken advantage of. But this same advantage will be wasted and will turn into a disadvantage if you neglect your overall development. On the other hand, if you are short, old, potbellied, bald, poor, and on top of that without a car, you will have to develop other behavioral attributes to compensate for these deficiencies. Surpass your rivals in the right characteristics and you will take the lead. In the field of living together, the main attributes to develop are behavioral ones, although physical attributes also count. There is, unequivocally, a widespread prejudice against less physically gifted people of both sexes, but this prejudice can be overcome by developing the right behavioral characteristics.

They want to be subdued by their own passion, and that is why they raise so much hell, defy, provoke, and rebel so much against coercive dominance. They do not want to be subdued by means of our passions, which would force them to satisfy those passions, but rather by means of their own passions. From the feminine point of view, the whole world must revolve around personal passions and feelings. Our feelings, passions, desires, and wishes do not interest them except insofar as they can be used to satisfy theirs. A great many people of the female sex see only themselves:

> “Narcissism and megalomania are characteristics common to women of all cultures. Certainly, they wear different disguises from one people to another.” (PACHECO, 1987, p. 40)

The greatest feminine difficulty is going against herself; that does emotional violence to them. Never push in that direction. When you come up against resistance, do not insist. Instead, excite the imagination and wait for the natural results, within the dynamics of her desires and not yours. Wait patiently and you will see the obstacles give way little by little. Imaginative excitement is similar to sexual excitement: it is slow but can be deep.

As Francesco Alberoni (1986) states, feminine eroticism is continuous and masculine eroticism discontinuous. Schopenhauer (2004) says the same:

> “Man is by nature inclined to inconstancy in love; woman, to constancy. A man’s love diminishes markedly from the moment it attains satisfaction. Almost any other woman excites him more than the one he already possesses: he longs for variety. A woman’s love, on the contrary, increases precisely from that moment. This is a consequence of nature’s aim, which is directed toward the preservation of the species and is therefore directed as intensely as possible toward reproduction. A man can in fact easily beget more than a hundred children a year, if he had a large number of women at his disposal; a woman, by contrast, even with many men, can bring only a single child into the world per year (twins excepted). That is why he always has his eye on other women, while she fixes on a single man, for nature leads her instinctively and spontaneously to stay with the provider and protector of the future offspring.” (pp. 45–46)

This means that we like to begin, conclude, and start over, while our dear manipulators want the opposite: the permanence of masculine interest. They want to be permanently loved, desired, and pursued; they fight to maintain permanence and feel an aversion to ending, to conclusion. Indefiniteness is the means they resort to in order to achieve permanence: permanence of masculine passion, of pursuit, of the servility of males for all eternity. They want continuity out of fear of the future.

Our dear manipulators have three basic needs, which they cannot do without and for which they fight their whole lives: to be loved, desired, and protected. Note well: this does not mean that they want to love or desire the man, as some believe. They do not want to give back; they want only to receive and enjoy. And one more idiot who gives himself up will be welcome. They want to build a matriarchal clan made up of countless lovesick wretches eternally willing to give protection and love without receiving anything in return. They take pleasure in knowing that they are desired (Nietzsche, 1884-1885/1985) because through masculine desire they obtain love and protection, in addition to the countless advantages that unfold from them.

To keep the servility going, they excite our love and our desire without ever satisfying them fully, only partially, with the aim of keeping them alive indefinitely. They avoid satisfaction because they know that to satisfy is to conclude and that to conclude desire is to end dependence. Since what matters to them are their own loving feelings and not ours, they see no reason for any feeling of guilt or pity.

To “counterattack,” we need only excite the three basic needs (to be desired, protected, and loved) without ever satisfying them fully, as they do with us, turning continuity back in our favor. If you let feminine desires be completely satisfied, your partner will feel secure, become snobbish, and stop giving you affection as she should. Believing that you are already caught, she will move on to the emotional imprisonment of others, and so on. The solution is to be equally contradictory, exciting, promising, but satisfying only partially. That way we preserve the feelings we want. The same strategies used by the sly ones against us can be redirected back at them, in this case as self-defense.

This logic makes an old and disturbing contradiction understandable. It explains why our love is rejected when we want them to love us and why we are sought out only by those we reject. What happens is that females come out of their inertia and devote themselves to taking care of the relationship only when they feel that their object of use is not very accessible or is drifting away. When the object is accessible, there is no problem, and the tendency is to relax, to grow careless. If you offer your love or interest to a woman for free, there will be no need for any work to obtain it, since what is most interesting will already have been handed over. Continued dedication requires continued indefiniteness, doubt, and insecurity. Leave her insecure and you will be the object of caresses, attempts at seduction, etc., aimed at subduing you. Enjoy it, and do not allow polarization.

Passion makes us repulsive because it conveys, among other things and at times, the message that we do not want to offer love but only to receive it. It also conveys the message that we are spineless. Since the feminine need is to be loved and protected, but never to love, if you show yourself needy or dependent you will be rejected, because softies cannot protect anyone and, what is more, they want to receive love and protection. A needy man is a man in need of love. A man in need of love is someone who wants to receive love and not to give love. He wants an emotional lifeline. That is precisely what scares them off.

Do not want to receive love, and do not want to receive sex. Become independent. Just offer love, protection, and support without actually giving them. Then your partner will try to “buy” them with her charms, and you will be able to enjoy yourself for as long as you manage to confuse her by remaining in indefiniteness. The very common idea that one receives love by giving love is a lie; it does not hold for humanoids with a subjective psyche. In truth, one receives love by offering love without actually giving it. This is the logic that really governs ridiculous “love.” We are animals and want only to satisfy our instincts, among them the need to receive protection, care, and affection. Nobody wants to give them, only to receive them. When people do give them, they do so with some other intention, even if a hidden one.

The man in love lacks the love of others and wants to make up for that lack. He is repulsive, on the one hand, because he does not offer what females need, but attractive, on the other, because he is a possible emotional slave.

Feminine love is not a reciprocation; it is a strategy for winning the three benefits mentioned. If the benefits are easily available, there will be no need whatsoever for dedication or for conquest. If they are absolutely inaccessible, on the other hand, there will likewise be no point at all in the latter.

We can say that, for men, there are two possibilities in love: 1) receiving the partner’s heart; 2) handing one’s heart over to the partner. The strong man receives and the weak man hands over.

The more we want our partners to desire us, love us, treat us well, etc., the less worried we will leave them and the less dedication we will receive. Feminine love is refractory to pressure. Pressure your partner to love you and she will detest you; she will develop an aversion. She will keep you captive only as a slave and will look for another man who ignores and despises her, to offer and give herself to. Trying to force women to love us is a waste of time:

> “Love is like faith: it will not be forced.” (SCHOPENHAUER, 2004, p. 41)

When we demand that they love and desire us, we are indirectly communicating that we have nothing to offer, since we want only to receive and not to give. Going the other way, when we hasten to flatter and please, we are indirectly communicating that we are submissive and that there is no need for anything to be done to hold on to us, no affection to be given, etc. The solution is not to demand, to offer and not to give. Offer a lot, give almost nothing, and demand nothing.

Except in the sexual field, it is a mistake to satisfy them fully. The ideal is to excite their dreams and desires, filling them with hopes, promising and never fully keeping the promise, as they do with us. To preserve desire, we must not satisfy it fully.

The fact that they wish to be loved and protected does not mean that they will automatically love those who hasten to love and protect them, but quite the opposite: they will love those who excite their imagination by holding out such promises without ever fully keeping them. The skill of the great seducer consists precisely in exciting the imagination, in convincing them, in making them believe, and then immobilizing them in doubt.

We complain about the absurdity of our lady friends loving only the cads who do not love them, but in truth there is nothing absurd about it at all; it is perfectly logical. People only worry about things when they are losing them. Women are born with this knowledge, since they are instinctively governed by the logic of feelings.

There is, moreover, a very simple and highly efficient way to bind very refractory, cold, and difficult women: it consists in seeking them out only for sex and ignoring them the rest of the time (without admitting it, of course). Try to have wild sex and then forget her for a while. Do not keep calling, watching, chasing after her, etc. Simply ignore her until she seeks you out again, and then receive her with the ardor and intensity of an animal. Make her feel like a wild female in heat. It usually works very well.

The affection and love offered to you are meant to soften you, like the wave that slowly erodes and wears down the rock. They are tests: the loved and desired ones are the firm men, who never let themselves be bewitched. If you let yourself be fascinated, you will immediately be considered weak and seen as a bottom-rank male who is easily bent. This explains why feminine love does not meet masculine love and is directed at those who do not love them. Therefore, the more resistant we are to the spells of affection and love, the more affection and love (not infrequently hypocritical, because they carry an ulterior motive) we will receive, which can be used strategically so that we have the emotional servility of the sly ones at our disposal when we need it (inversion), as happens to us in relation to them. This strange logic is explained by the fact that females need protection and only tough guys are able to offer it. What security or protection could be offered by the kind, romantic, and sensitive men who are satisfied with a hypocritical "spiritual" love? They are not even capable of protecting themselves; they need the love of others to be happy and bring happiness to no one.

The profile of the ideal man who stands up to feminine spells can be summed up as cold, distant, mysterious, impenetrable, silent, concentrated, active, leading, daring, courageous, indifferent, and protective. He is like nothingness, like the void, or like water, in which all attacks cancel themselves out.[1]

26. The Illusion of Love

Today, August 9, 2004, I had yet another opportunity to study feminine fantasy while watching the film "The Prince & Me." I then understood a little more about the cold, calculating, and implacable logic of so-called love.

The actress in the film has a simple beauty, short hair, and small breasts, clearly representing an ordinary woman, lacking great attractions. Even so, she subdues a prince of Denmark who falls in love with her, and in the end they are together, as in every rose-colored romance. Today the film reminds me of a sentence by the psychoanalyst Cláudia Pacheco (1987):

> "The 'queens' [women] want to find their 'Prince Charmings' and with them organize their 'reign of the home.'" (p. 40)

I then reflected on the fatal logic of feminine love: the desired man is the most socially prominent one. Feminine love is, therefore, absolutely self-interested. There are no Beggar Charmings, only princes.

Just as we men are absolutely merciless toward women poorly endowed with beauty,[1] women are also merciless toward socially unsuccessful men. This means that the logic of passion is animalistic and that both women and men are purely instinctive, despite the erroneous prevailing idea that only we males behave like animals. The comparison that Karen Salmansohn (1994) makes between men and dogs is not entirely unfounded, even though this author seems to forget that her gender, like ours, belongs to one more species of the animal kingdom.

In rose-colored romances, the hero is someone prominent, distinguished, never an ordinary man. The ordinary man has no place in feminine fantasy. The woman is always on the lookout for the "best" man (the most socially prominent) within her reach, to bewitch him and bind him to herself.

It is well known that women, as a rule, are not attracted to men who are shorter than they are or who are in hierarchically inferior positions. When they accept them, they do so because they could not get other, "better" ones. If we give them the means to attract such men (souping them up, for example, by investing a lot of money in beautifying their bodies and teaching them to behave like sex goddesses, since, unfortunately, these are the attributes that magnetically attract males), everything will change, unfortunately. They will then be courted by males considered "superior" to the uninteresting guys they have at home and, if they correspond to the type of woman we are dealing with here, they will betray them. This is a fatal logic from which we cannot escape and which we have to accept, on pain of going mad if we do not: feminine attraction is almost always directed at the most prominent man in the masculine hierarchy. Thus, we can conclude that love as people understand it, that is, romantic love, is nothing but a lie, and that we must never let ourselves be moved by feminine tears, because these are shed not for us but for the social standing we have, whether great or small.

I have seen this behavioral pattern confirmed many, many times, and I do not have the slightest shadow of a doubt about it. But the problem does not end there. On top of that, they dream that the prince and his empire will accept them just as they are, without their having to make any change or adaptation. Women do not want to yield on anything and do so only when there is no option, but they always go on dreaming of a wonderful world in which they are the central figures.

We were taught from childhood that women are sensitive beings whom we should please through efforts to satisfy their desires. We were made to believe that they would thereby return love for love and dedication for dedication, that they would love us spontaneously on realizing that we love them and strive to cater to their tastes. This is a lie that led to the adoption of erroneous behavioral patterns. Now we are conditioned, and we need to adopt a new behavior to achieve the ends we aim for, but to do so it is first necessary to know that behavior clearly.

What defines the appropriate behavior for conquest and for living together are the structures of the feminine unconscious, and not what is consciously said and acknowledged. Love, as it was taught to us, is a pestilent lie that must be abandoned.

27. How to Be Fascinating in the Eyes of Women

Note: This article was written in the 1990s and had not been published until the first online edition of this book. I have revised it, expanded on it, and clarified the points that allowed for misinterpretations, biased readings, and intentional distortions.

I am now going to write without the slightest modesty and without any concern for the feminists.[1]

Our modern Western culture has put into our heads the belief that a woman's love comes as a mere return for our love and desire. Thus, it would be enough for us to love them sincerely to have our love reciprocated. This error has done a great deal of damage.

In truth, the woman, except in exceptional cases, does not love any man in and of himself, but rather the attractive characteristics he possesses. When a man presents certain attributes that correspond to feminine follies, the woman says she adores him. In truth, she is fascinated by the attributes she has found. We are not loved for what we are but for what they desire and imagine us to be:

> "Women are Psyche seeing her beloved more as Eros, in his role as god of love, than as the man she knows and could love for what he is." (JOHNSON, 1987)

If a hundred men with the same attributes (or with a few more that are even better in their eyes) appear before them, all of them will be loved madly and at the same time. Betrayal is neither exclusively masculine nor more of a masculine tendency, as everyone believes. That is pure prejudice against us. This prejudice dictates that we are all shameless while they are all little saints.

All females are highly selective, but this does not mean that they are naturally faithful or monogamous. They want to offer their sex only to those who seem best in their eyes. They are highly discerning in their choice and stay with the best they can get. They are not like us, who seem like pigs and eat any garbage.

To understand this dynamic, we have to understand what the feminine selection criteria are. Brace yourself, because I am going to dissect them without mercy.

When a woman is young and, at the same time, stupid,[2] her main selection criterion is the prominence that boys gain through worthlessness, delinquency, and the brands of their clothes and cars. The archetype of the superman has not yet matured in her imagination, and her poor brain[3] makes her believe that the worst will be the best. In this phase, the good and sincere ones, who truly love them, are rejected and ridiculed. When the miracle of their being accepted happens, they are accepted only in the role of emotional slaves and nothing more, and because there really was no playboy available nearby. Later on, in the future, she gets screwed, gets pregnant, loses her beauty, her youth, and her attractions and, of course, the guy she had chosen

[2] And not when she is young and intelligent, which is also the case. This stupidity refers exclusively to the criterion of selection in love and to no other field. I took my inspiration from women's books in which this observation appears as an expression of women's indignation at the fact that men value them for their beauty and prefer the "prettier" ones, regardless of sincerity.

[3] Obviously, those who do not scorn the good ones and refuse to admire the worst would not fit this definition. On the other hand, there are young men who are equally foolish, with equally poor brains.

trades her in for another brand-new young thing, abandoning her without support.[4] Then the woman will wake up to reality but, by this point, she will already be "uglier"[5] and, therefore, less demanding, accepting the sincere ones. In other words: the emotionally honest men eat the leftovers rejected by the playboys and cads.

On the subject of height: women are never fascinated by men who are inferior to them. This can be seen, for example, in their taste for men who are taller than they are or at least the same height. Men who marry much taller women must combine a great sum of other attributes to be superior to the big guys and avoid wearing horns. Between two suitors absolutely equal in everything except height, the preferred one will be the taller.

However, do not believe that height alone is enough. The female is crazy to give her sex to men who are superior in any sense, but if the guy is superior only in height, he too will wear horns. Most of the committed women whom a colleague of mine conquered belonged to big men, and he was short. What happens is that they often get involved exclusively with tall guys when they are still very young and, at the same time, foolish, but later they discover that these men are normal human beings and can at times be as childish, stupid, crude, and uninteresting as the short ones.[6] Since they madly want to give their sex to a superman, they put horns on the gorilla if a more intelligent chimpanzee who knows how to seduce them comes along.

[5] I must remind the reader that, as Tolstoy said, criteria of beauty are relative; they do not exist from an objective point of view and vary enormously across time, space, cultures, emotional states, and individuals. By "ugly" I mean here those women who do not fit the dictatorial standards of beauty adopted by the very "playboys" they preferred and who later scorn them. Even so, these same women may be considered "pretty" by men who adopt other criteria. Beauty exists only from the subjective point of view, depending on the inner state of the one who contemplates. We do not understand that so-and-so is beautiful; we feel it, because beauty is not something rational. "Beautiful" is the woman a man has fallen in love with, regardless of her "objective" forms (I do not believe in the objectivity of matter). Passion transfigures its object. As Schopenhauer (2004) said, it is the instincts that lead a man to consider a woman beautiful; that is, a woman is not, in herself, beautiful or ugly. A woman will be considered "beautiful" when she dresses or behaves in certain ways and "ugly" when she does not match them, because, as the popular saying goes, "beauty is in the eye of the beholder." Even so, society considers beauty important, and this reminds me of the famous line by Vinícius de Moraes: "May the ugly ones forgive me, but beauty is essential!" This line expresses the value that we men place on feminine beauty, a valuation that does not seem entirely unfair to me, given that women also tend to value us for our positions in the social hierarchy and not for our inner beauty. Recognition of the value of inner beauty exists only in a dream world or in exceptional cases. What is generally called "a woman's beauty" is feminine characteristics accentuated in physical features and in manners.

[6] In other words: there is no relation whatsoever between character and height. A tall man may have behavioral characteristics that are attractive to women, and another man of the same height may not have them. The same holds for short men. Some short men are highly uninteresting to women, while others are not.

What every woman wants, unconsciously, is to go wild, to go crazy, to lose her reason completely.[7] But she does this only with someone she considers special. So, if you want one, what you have to do is stand out in her eyes, positively, preferably, or negatively, if you have no other resource. But it takes skill to do this. Do not go around showing off, because they will simply mock you and you will end up looking like an idiot.

To begin with, a man must have real attractions and not simply pretend to have them. If you think that just by pretending you are going to bang them all, you can throw your brain in the toilet and flush, because you are dead wrong. The woman will observe you and will perceive your pretense and your weaknesses through your attitudes. Then she will pretend that she is being fooled, and afterward she will screw you over somehow. You will be left crying, and there is no point in writing to me, because I will tell you to go to hell.

The fact that women generally do not approach the problems of love life through rational and intellectual means in no way means that they are unintelligent; on the contrary, it indicates that they are much more intelligent than we are, because in the dangerous field of love what counts is not the intellect but the capacity not to let oneself be destroyed emotionally and also, unfortunately, the capacity to strike at the other person's feelings. The intellect must be passive:

The intellect serves only to analyze, classify, identify causes and consequences, systematize, argue, and theorize so as, finally and after all that, to conclude and understand. However, all of this is secondary in the war of passion, because instinct is much faster.

The man who conceives of intelligence only in intellectual terms underestimates the power of intuition and of emotional intelligence, which will not always be used for good and may even destroy him emotionally. The capacity to intuit is related to sensibility (KANT, 1992), which is highly

This greater emotional and intuitive intelligence in women means that they almost always win the war of love. The skill and frequency with which they win are so great that they usually take this victory for granted. Men tend to underestimate feminine intelligence because of the visible absence of analytical, conceptual, argumentative, etc., content in their behavior, and that is why they get screwed. The mistake can at times even be fatal.

Women are not stupid, as men think, misled by appearances. They are highly intelligent. They merely feign naïveté to seem foolish, because that way they fool men and can plead ignorance and lack of understanding about what they do. Their intelligence works in a way that we hardly notice exists and that they purposely hide from us.[8] They are so intelligent that they are actually emotionally dangerous, and that is why I am writing this article: so that we can defend ourselves against these sly, marvelous, terrible, and delicious witches, securing them for ourselves alone. Feminine intelligence is predominantly emotional and not intellectual. They are so clever that they convince anyone when they feign naïveté, innocence, and ignorance. Feminine illogicality is a sign of cleverness and not of a lack of intelligence.

The male who is interesting in feminine eyes is the one who stands out positively in the broadest possible way. They want to make love with a mixture of the superhuman mythical hero and the villain of rose-colored romances and syrupy soap operas. This is the ideal man. Observe him and study him, because there lies the key. This is the “top monkey of the troop.” Do not delude yourself into thinking that kindness will be recognized.

In the Paleolithic, the ideal man was physically stronger and more warlike because he gave a sense of protection. Today this attribute has been transferred to other spheres, but in essence it remains the same, because the woman wants a man who gives her a sense of security in various senses. If you doubt it, just observe prominent men: artists, businessmen, mobsters, and others. They are the owners of veritable harems:

> "Objective and unprejudiced observation of reality shows us that there are only a few categories of men who have very beautiful women: charismatic leaders, millionaires, famous stars, great actors, great directors, and Gangsters.
> Beauty, great beauty, is inexorably attracted by power, and power tends, inexorably, to monopolize it. It is this deep, ancestral bond, yet always alive and renewed, that makes ordinary men prudent." (ALBERONI, 1986/n.d., p. 32)

If you are shy, fearful, sentimental, sensitive, needy, or withdrawn and want to be that way forever, stubbornly refusing to change, give up, because women are not for you. Renounce your masculinity and forget them, because fragility is a feminine attribute and not a masculine one. Of course, we males have limits and weaknesses, but they do not want to see them. They want to know only our strong points, our attractions. They are intolerant of our weaknesses and frailties, although they say otherwise.

A first attribute that drives females crazy is a man's skill at making money. This happens because they have had an ancestral instinct for unconscious prostitution since the Paleolithic and want to give their sex to whoever has the greatest material resources, just like the females of other mammals. Prostitution is the oldest feminine profession there is, and we should not be prejudiced against prostitutes. Of course, no sly one will admit this and she will even feign indignation, but observation will reveal it with mathematical exactness. Notice that the richest males end up with the women the others would like to have. Verify this fact and then conclude for yourself whether or not I am lying about it. But do not delude yourself: if you have only money and nothing else, you will also wear horns, because she will not be fulfilled. If you just want to have fun without commitment there will be no problem, but do not get the idea of marrying, because you will be used only as a material provider and other guys will take her to the motel.

A second attractive attribute is indifference. If you keep hitting on them like a desperate man, the only thing you will achieve is making them believe that you are incompetent and unskilled at conquest, a mere harasser.

The fascinating man does not attack, does not hit on anyone, and does not bother anyone. He simply exists with his attractions and observes them as if he were not observing them, remaining indifferent while they go crazy. He seeks and tightens contact without any pretension.

If you are already in a regular relationship with some delicious woman, a good way to achieve indifference is to work on the death of the egos involved in passion. When your partner starts with little games, tests, and sessions of mental torture, do not occupy your mind with these useless things, and you will see that she will soon be chasing after you like crazy.

These guys who keep harassing women in the street, accosting them everywhere, following them, or groping them without their consent are nothing but incompetent brutes. It is because of them that it is so hard to win over the hottest ones, who think that all men are alike.

A third attribute is being sociable. Mind you: you must be indifferent but friendly. If you stay withdrawn, sitting at home hatching eggs and waiting for some gorgeous creature to fall from the sky onto your head with her vagina open, you will grow old and shriveled. You must get to know many women, be a true friend, and little by little become more and more intimate. To make her crazy to give you sex, you have to keep talking with her about herself, understanding her more and more. Soon she will be telling you her intimate secrets. Do not betray her.

Women, like men, have a gigantic need to be understood without understanding the other. But do not think this means we must do everything they want. When a man truly understands the feminine psyche, he knows all its tricks and tests. He knows that if he is submissive he will be considered a poor wretch, and that he needs to be better than she is in every field to be attractive.

A fourth attribute is intelligence. A dumb guy is a big zero. But do not go showing off your erudition, because you will also become irritating. Know how to measure what you say, be deep in conversation, and keep her life at the center of your talks, as if you knew her better than she knows herself. Try to study, to have at least a reasonable level of education, so that the feminine unconscious considers you superior to the other hominids.

A fifth attribute is prominence. Any male who stands out before a group is desired by the females of the band. Lecturers, for example, when they are good and impressive, almost always bag a few "tramps"[9] from the audience. The rowdiest kids are the school heartthrobs because they defy authority and answer the collective longing of foolish adolescents, standing out in this way. The same happens with great men who are brilliant leaders, for good or for evil, and who stand out, like Che Guevara, mobsters, business owners or gang leaders, famous artists, etc., who are likewise set apart from the rest. But you do not need to go that far... it is enough to be better than your rivals in the right respects.

A sixth attribute is speech. Try to modulate your voice and use words in a very masculine and superior way, but not a crude one. Avoid swearing or talking like a hick or an illiterate. If your level of education is low, have some shame, practice, and start reading to enrich your vocabulary (without using words that sound weird).[10] Also avoid demasculinized speech. If you spend a lot of time with women, be careful not to unconsciously internalize feminine intonations and expressions in your speech.

A seventh attribute is decisiveness. Women like decisive men, who take action. You know those guys who do the right thing at the crucial moment, when nobody knows what to do? Well... Do not be hesitant. Always do the right thing. For example, show firmness in getting work, in achieving personal and material accomplishments. Do not keep wavering or she will take you for a sucker.

The more "beautiful" the woman, the harder to deal with and the fussier she is.[11] The more "ugly"[12] she is, the easier. Unfortunately, a woman's social

[10] I am not prejudiced against men with little education. It is the feminine unconscious that is...

[11] To better understand this aspect, I suggest that the reader watch or read the play "Pretty but Wicked," by Nelson Rodrigues.

[12] Let us remember that ugliness is always relative. A person will never be absolutely "ugly" but rather relatively "ugly." She will be "ugly" from a certain point of view or in a certain respect, and in relation to something. A woman may be "ugly" to one man and lovely to another; she may be "ugly" or "lovely" to herself or to other women; she may be "ugly" outwardly or inwardly, etc. My point of view is that all people, including those of the female sex, are simultaneously lovely value is given by her physical beauty, and the loveliest women tend to be the most complicated to have a relationship with. Lovely women are rarely marriage material. In general, it seems to me, they are mere pieces of meat and are good only for sex, because they can easily commit adultery when males better than you come along.[13] The "ugly" woman is better suited to marriage because, having no options, she is more reluctant to betray, although such women also have the ancestral natural tendency toward unconscious prostitution. Eliane Calligaris describes this tendency of the unconscious in an interesting way:

"Many women find it hard to share their sexual fantasies with the man they love. Sometimes they imagine: 'What will he think of me? Will he go on loving me as his wife and the mother of his children?'" (Calligaris, 2006, n.p.)

"The prostitution fantasy allows a woman to develop her sexuality without the father's fetters and to give herself to the relationship with a man or even with a woman." (Calligaris, 2006, n.p.)

"If she establishes, for another man, the same value of desire that she attributed to her father, she will have to be only a lady—and not give herself sexually to him [which explains husbands' complaint that their wives keep their distance], since the last thing she wants to lose is love [received one-sidedly, however]. But the woman may also understand the opposite. When she must overcome her desire for her father, she feels betrayed and thinks the following: I want all men in place of one. So she chooses another option, that of the prostitute. Not actual prostitution, but giving herself to unknown men [and, therefore, it is the one who does not let himself be known, the mysterious one, who arouses sexual attraction, and not the sincere one who shows himself and lets himself be known]." (Calligaris, 2006, n.p.)

and horrible in multiple respects. In the sentence in question, I am referring to those women who consider themselves not to fit the conventional stereotypes of the twenty-first century. For me, these women are easier to deal with and more understanding. Obviously, these same women may be considered lovely in various respects or by various men, depending on the situation. A man knows how to find beauty in a woman when he desires her (Alberoni, 1986/n.d.). Beauty in itself does not exist; it is simply a projected mental form. I, for example, find a Kuikuro woman far lovelier and more desirable than any top model and would never trade the one for the other. A woman is not beautiful or ugly in and of herself, but rather to the one who contemplates her. It is the instincts that falsify a man's perception, leading him to see woman as "the fair sex" (SCHOPENHAUER, 2004).

[13] This reality is portrayed in "Faust." When the hero meets Helen, Beauty, he is warned that he must always be ready to defend her by force of arms, since she is the most beautiful (GOETHE, 1806 and 1832/2006). The competition among males for the most beautiful women tends to be fierce.

"The love relationship between a man and a woman can be pernicious because it produces an intimacy between two people that should never happen. Desire becomes ashamed to exist. The prostitute is the one who does not ask where the man comes from. For her, he is a stranger. Men like to be in this position." (Calligaris, 2006, n.p.)

In prostitution, unconscious fantasies linked to total sexual surrender are externalized (Calligaris, 2005). We should not harbor negative feelings toward prostitutes; they simply fulfill an important social function and, as far as the sincerity of loving feelings and fidelity are concerned, they show themselves as they are from the start, deceiving no one. No man could protest against a prostitute, accusing her of betraying his feelings by having had sexual relations with other men; that would simply be ridiculous. In this sense, they are very honest, unlike the sly ones who want to seem naive, pure, saintly, and faithful.

If you think that some woman will love you out of pity, simply because she wants to return your love and your desire, you are lost. The "tramps"[14] do not love after you hand over your heart; they only pretend to love you before you hand it over.

Such women are envious and wicked. The guys who think they will win them over by being nice just get screwed. The women torture them and drive them mad. I know some who even killed themselves over it. And do you think the women felt sorry?

Envious by nature, these women throw themselves at a man when they see him with a lovely girlfriend, in order to take him. According to Cláudia Pacheco (1987), what motivates them to do this is envy. You can take advantage of this fact by getting a lovely girlfriend or by paying some pretty escort to go out with you somewhere where there is a woman you want to conquer. That way, the unconscious of your "prey" will believe that if you have a marvelous and superior female, you can only be really good. Then you will have conquered her.

[15] In the sense given by the Michaelis (1995) and Aurélio (FERREIRA, 1995) dictionaries.

Wicked as they are, the “tramps”[15] tirelessly subject the man to tests and sessions of disguised mental torture to learn his reactions. They make dates and do not show up, provoke jealousy with kind gestures toward other males without admitting it, promise wonders in the sexual field and do not deliver, etc., all for the purpose of seeing the man’s reactions. The most interesting thing is the little game of coming closer and pulling away that they play to leave the man confused, insecure, and crazy. For all these reasons, it is extremely important not to fall in love, but at times to pretend perfectly that one is in love, at least until the bond is firmly established. The man in love is seen as a dying wretch worthy of pity, and women do not feel attracted to poor wretches.

If you are not in love, you will pass all these tests and the woman will give herself up, defeated. But for this it is important that you have eliminated at least a good part of the psychic aggregates involved in passion so as to be able to hold out; otherwise you will cave in. When the little games happen, go along with them without being disturbed. When she comes closer, receive her, and when she pulls away pretending to scorn you, ignore her until she comes back.

The man who becomes emotionally dependent causes repulsion. He is seen as a weakling, as someone who deserves only crumbs of love and to whom she will only make small erotic and affectionate “concessions” from time to time, but to whom she will never give herself fully, because in her eyes surrender is reserved only for those who are inaccessible.

When a male is considered inaccessible or semi-inaccessible because of his superiority, he awakens the wildest passions. The female will try by every possible means to topple him, bring him down, and bend him. She will feign fragility, sadness, vulnerability to try to stimulate the masculine protective instinct. If that fails, she will start provoking him with low necklines and short skirts, observing his reactions. She will try to irritate him, embarrass him, enrage him... If none of this works, she will send notes and love letters, she will call. Between one of these attempts and the next, she may try to ridicule him to take revenge for being rejected. If the male accepts her, he should do so as if it were a mere momentary concession of his precious time and he were not very interested in it.

What makes some women so avid for the best males is their envious nature and their natural tendency toward unconscious prostitution. They want the most prominent males in order to show them off and to obtain material guarantees. Feminine love smells of material goods and exhibitionism. Notice that there are no Beggar Charmings, only Prince Charmings. Have you noticed?

All of this is part of the enchanting attributes of the superior man whom women look for like crazy but almost never find. At bottom, it all comes down to working positively on the beliefs they hold about us, installing them in a favorable way and protecting ourselves against their spells, which are powerful and must not be underestimated. It is no accident that medieval culture and Islamic culture guarded so heavily against the power of this refractory, ambiguous, fascinating, fleeting, and delicious being!

28. On the Telephone

Women love a great deal through the ear, unlike us, who overvalue the visual side. They appreciate songs and whispers of love, and they get aroused on the telephone when we know how to use our voice and speech the right way.

With a telephone in hand, you will have only two weapons: your tone of voice and the content of your speech, the subjects you are going to talk about.

Do not call before you have clearly and decisively in mind what you are going to say. Be kind but firm. Say what you have to say and withdraw. If you keep stretching out the contact unnecessarily, you will be seen as weak and needy. Plan what you are going to say, call, say it clearly and directly, and withdraw.

Beware of psychic standstills, that is, of hesitation. Psychic standstills are moments when our action is frozen by uncertainty about what we should or should not say, leaving us with nothing to talk about. It is better to finish what has to be said and hang up the telephone than to drag out the conversation and fall into a ridiculous silence because we do not know what to say. Having nothing to talk about in a telephone contact causes a loss of prestige because it indicates that we do not know what we want, that we are hesitant, wavering, indecisive men and, therefore, uninteresting.

One way to prevent a psychic standstill is to draw up a plan for the conversation in advance, carefully choosing the subjects. To make a mark on the feminine imagination, leading her to see you as a different kind of male, avoid at all costs the mechanical repetition of the same subjects that all the idiots bring up.

Use a commanding tone of voice; be imperative.

Do not wait for her to end the conversation. Take the initiative and hang up first. Save the "wish to talk more" for another occasion. The sly ones want to hang up on us, so rob her of the feeling of victory by hanging up first.

Do not keep plying her with questions. This shows excessive interest and causes aversion, because only weaklings and needy men, incapable of conquering interesting females, show excessive interest in one particular woman.

Command the conversation; be the leader. At the same time, be protective. Show determination and a slight concern for her. As Riddick says to Jack: "Maybe I care."[1] Do not show excessive concern.

Do not return calls immediately. Let her call once or twice and only then call back. Surprise her by calling unexpectedly from time to time.

To keep feminine excitement at the highest possible levels and for most of the time, activate her imagination by saying the things that reach her. However, alternate, absenting yourself until she seeks you out. Continuous action in a single direction causes boredom. Observe how they alternate their conduct with us.

When we deal with women, whether on the telephone or in person, we need an arsenal of means that lead them to reveal their real intentions. We must have reactions at hand that prevent them from dodging clarity. It is common, for example, for certain women to take the initiative of calling or to send out signs of interest to draw you into contact by telephone or in person but, as soon as they are with you or listening to you, to fall silent or hit you with the disconcerting question: “What do you want?” Other times they simply order: “Talk.” In acting this way, they subliminally suggest that the interested party is you and not her. In suggesting this, they are setting themselves up as a prize. This subliminal suggestion must not be accepted and needs to be dismantled. To disarm it, all you need to do is create a situation that forces her to reveal whether she is really interested or not, so as to eliminate any shadow of doubt. If she starts toying with you, sending contradictory signals to confuse you, resolutely and without the slightest hesitation or fear create a definitive situation by telling her something more or less like this: “Call only when you are really interested in me. If you (the sly one) do not call me within n days (a deadline set by you) I will know that you were never interested, and I will not wait any longer.” Then hang up on her. With this procedure you force her to reveal her true intentions and you disarm the little game, because the situation allows no kind of confusion. The very attempt to confuse will unmask her. If the woman does not call, she will have revealed herself, and if she does call, so will she! By acting this way, you will be showing yourself to be a decisive and determined man who does not hesitate in his goals. Obviously, it will backfire if you are in love or attached, because this means “setting off a bomb” that hits only the one who is more in love, more attached, and more in need of the other.

29. Appendices

Note 1. What follows are an interview and some e-mail messages sent to friends. In this third online edition, I have replaced some words with synonyms for greater clarity and to prevent intentional distortions and biased interpretations by one-sided readers. All the observations contained here, like the others in the book, refer only to women who match the behavioral profile we are concerned with.

Note 2. This interview has never been published outside this book. It was conducted by a feminist reader, at my suggestion, in order to clarify confusing points that arose during a chaotic online discussion. After many fruitless attempts to get a small group of women to understand my points of view, and since the confusion only kept growing, I asked them to send their objections in the form of questions. The interviewer's identity has been kept confidential.

Note 3. The letters here are, for the most part, replies to messages from various hostile feminists who wrote to me attacking my points of view. There are also replies to some people who asked for my opinions about the situations they were going through. The identity of the correspondents has been kept confidential in all cases.

Appendix 1. Interview with the Author

Q: Why do women get married?

In the overwhelming majority of cases, because they want a sucker to show off to their family, their friends, and society, and also to put horns on. That is why they demand that men be sincere, hardworking, and willing to commit. These are the so-called "good boys," whose function is to love without being loved, because the ones who will truly receive all the love are the bad ones, the cads, the good-for-nothings, whom they call "a walking temptation." These are more magnetic and attract them intensely. It is common to hear it said that they "marry the good boys," that is, the idiots.

Q: You claim that a woman does not know what she wants to be (friend, casual "hookup," lover, girlfriend, or wife). Have you never thought that this happens because men show no interest and have no security, when we need that, and if we do not have it, we bail out?

Yes. I analyze it. That is why I recommend that a man define the relationship according to how the woman acts and behaves and not according to what she says.

Q: Why do men close up when they have problems? And why do they think their thoughts are the only truth?

They close up to concentrate and bring down the prey or the enemy (the problem). No hunter or warrior likes to be interrupted. As for the other question: because feminine arguments lack logical objectivity, and to convince us

[1] In the field of love conflicts. My point of view is that discussing the relationship makes everything worse. Since feminine opinions are grounded in feelings, every attempt to fit them one must be rational.[1] We do not change our minds when there is a logical flaw, just because.

Q: Why are you men so prejudiced, never open to other opinions?

The thing is that women have difficulty constructing arguments because they are not very logical.

Q: If keeping quiet and forgetting the problem really is the ideal, why do men go to debates and lectures, and why do they study?

They go to debates to confront one another. They go to lectures and study to understand things that interest them. However, one cannot debate, lecture on, or study the relationship with one's partner.

Q: If a man can discuss problems at work, with relatives and friends, why can he not discuss the relationship with his woman, especially since he says he loves her?

Because a woman is refractory to opinions contrary to her own. Her positions originate from feelings and not from analysis.

Q: If a man has a young daughter who gets pregnant, will he say nothing because "it is useless to discuss problems with women, since they have their minds made up and men are not much for talking," with nothing being said or resolved? Will nothing matter?

No. In that case he should guide her correctly about what to do and not argue, leaving her to bear the consequences if she does not want to agree. He must never force her.

Q: If this daughter (who could also be the girlfriend, the wife, or the mother) is depressed and the MAN closes up, assuming that the sadness will end by itself: does he do nothing, or just say, "It's nothing, it'll soon pass"? Will it really pass?

into a logical system that is rational, and not emotional, will result in increased confusion. The same holds for the opinions of men gripped by exaggerated emotionality. The fact that a man is more rational does not mean that he is more intelligent. Especially where love problems are concerned, rationality gets in the way, because what comes into play are feelings: the capacity to overcome one's own emotional weaknesses.

It does not pass. It will pass only if he listens to her instead of arguing. A woman wants to be listened to and not interrogated, much less contradicted.

Q: Could it be that, even if one thinks [the sadness] has passed, the woman has in fact just stopped pressing HIM because it is useless, since the man is cold and does not understand, deciding no longer to share her problems because it is not worth it, thus starting a small void that will become an abyss?

Yes, because a woman needs to feel misunderstood by the man she lives with in order to justify to herself the fact that she is going to open up and give herself to another man. This lies at the basis of a personal theory I am developing.

Q: If "talking is a woman's thing, and a chatterbox doesn't suit a man," why do you men talk on Fridays when work is over?

It depends on the stage of development. Normally men talk to find women to have sex with. But there are also the more evolved ones, who discuss how to exercise dominance over[2] their particular partner so as not to need to go after others. This is the most interesting stage. Even monogamous men, like me, need to continually seduce and exercise dominance[3] over their women so as not to be traded in.

Q: How do you men talk, and about what?

We talk in a concentrated way, seeking objectivity, generally about our conquests and setbacks in love. Such conversations are extremely important for honing our skills, especially with regard to strategies of seduction, attack, and defense in the games of feelings and attraction with women. They are reflections. The talk of women[4] is not concentrated; it is scattered, vague, and superficial.[5] Being very much like children, they talk about silly things: what so-and-so did, what happened to such-and-such's wife, etc. There is no analysis, only superficial descriptions marked by an emotional undertone.

[2] In the sense already discussed in this book, that is, of avoiding conflicts.

[3] See the previous notes on dominance. By "dominance" we should understand the capacity to maintain a consented control of the situation so as to prevent the partner from sustaining conflicts.

[5] Although wide-ranging. The power to penetrate a topic pointedly and deeply, excluding everything else, is predominantly masculine and not feminine. Man is limited in range.

Q: Why do you men talk so much about women, or accuse men who do not score with anyone of being gay?

Yes, we talk, because this way we acquire strategic knowledge. Within the prevailing general parameters, it is clear that this guy who does not score with anyone is homosexual or, at the very least, has some organic dysfunction.[6] If he were really a sexually active male, he would be after the females. But there are also superior males who do not run "after all of them" because they are very demanding and scorn them.[7] Generally they have conquered a single woman who is worth several.[8]

Q: I ask again: do men love in relationships?

According to the common conception of love, only naive men do. With women, on the other hand, something like this happens: she falls in love with the guy's social attributes.

Q: Why do you men despair when a woman leaves for good, if you yourselves say that "there are plenty out there"?

Because you women cunningly bind us emotionally by giving affection so that we miss it at such times. Obviously, a mature man is immune, having already fallen into these traps many times in the past.

Q: Why do you get furious at a woman's difficulty in making up her mind, which leads her to leave situations undefined, if all women are alike and there are plenty available?

Because we like defined situations. We want to know whether she is going to want to be a call girl, a casual hookup, a casual lover, a lasting lover, a sex friend, a girlfriend, or a wife. Deep down, we want just one woman who has all the attributes we need, mainly the sexual one, of course, but also sincerity. We hate woman's typical dissimulation.

Q: Define a good relationship.

[6] Either one case or the other (either dysfunction or preference, and not both things simultaneously). The sentence does not establish causal relations between dysfunction and gender identity.

[7] I am referring to the snobbish and sly ones.

[8] In the field of feelings and sex. This does not mean that the woman matches stereotyped standards of beauty.

For me, it is a defined relationship, without the dirty feminine emotional games.

Q: What is a stable relationship like?

There are several kinds. The most common is with the woman who "is going to be like my mother," that is, a saint in daily life. But besides that she must be a fatal female,[9] with us and only with us, at night in bed.

Q: Why do you men never like your wives/girlfriends to have male friends?

Because it is a door to having sex with another man that the woman does not want to close. The greatest loves are born from friendships. Close, tight contacts are a passageway to a love relationship, and the woman who refuses to break them off is refusing to destroy the possibilities of a betrayal. No woman dreams of a man with a four-meter penis... you women dream of nice men who know how to approach you "without malice," etc. [so as to have them as slaves]. Besides, when you have a male friend, only you know for a fact whether something is going on or not. In this way you hide information from your partners so as to be able to dominate the relationship. That is why we do not want commitments with women who have male friends.

Q: But you men can have women friends?

No. Only if the woman acts like a "liberal" woman. The problem is not in being liberal but in not owning up to it, not admitting it, dissimulating, deceiving the man by letting him believe she will be faithful, etc.

Q: Everything we do is insufficient to please you; it is never good enough. So tell me, what is the woman you men want like?

We want a delicious woman who gives us sex and love in every way we want, who has no hang-ups, who keeps other males at a distance, who polices her acts with regard to men and does nothing we do not like without our consent. Strange as it may seem, we also want marriage, but not with "sluts." There

Q: An ex-boyfriend of mine could not answer me when I asked him what he wanted from me. What are you men looking for, after all?

He probably knew what he wanted but was confused by present-day feminist society's condemnation of his ideas. Besides, these masculine characteristics I am pointing out are unconscious most of the time. Only a scholar detects them, as is my case.

Q: According to your statements, a stable relationship should not have romantic love. So they will never have real relationships?

They will, but it is the woman who will love them for their distinctive and attractive characteristics, and not the other way around. A woman does not love in return for being loved, contrary to what women would have us believe. That is why we cannot love you: so that you will love us.[11] The man who loves (common, romantic love) becomes jealous, possessive, dependent, and clingy. The woman gets irritated and rejects him. These are the wretches who kill themselves or kill their wives. By contrast, the man free of passion is cold, distant, inaccessible, mysterious, unshakable, indifferent, and secure. So the woman tries to test him and torment him, but he does not even notice or, if he notices, he attaches no importance to it or finds it funny.[12] This is the interesting male, who passes the females' natural selection test. Not to be possessive, clingy, jealous, insecure, and dependent, one must first of all not be in love and not love. Women adore men like this and pursue them tirelessly.

Q: What is the psychological hell created by women that you mention several times?

There are several. The most common is leading us to depend on them emotionally without letting us reach a conclusion about what they are, that is, whether they are serious or easy for other males. In this way, they preserve the doubt. There are others, very interesting ones: making a date and not showing up, then observing our reactions; asking us to call and not answering the phone, to see how much we insist; promising sex and not delivering, to see whether we get irritated, etc. With each mental hell they create, a lot of information about us is obtained. That is why women are disconcerted by mysterious and impenetrable guys. They become powerless. Only those men defeat them, and then they give themselves up, defeated.

[12] It is in this sense that he dominates her, since he wears her down.

Q: Why do you men avoid falling in love? Out of fear?

Because we need to become strong, invulnerable to the spell of falling in love, in order to enjoy love. It is a struggle: either we defeat the Devil or the Devil defeats us. The one who wins commands and directs the defeated. Falling in love is a weakness, as the various legends show. In reality, the opposite of what your question insinuates happens: the woman fears the man who does not fall in love[13] and, therefore, desires him.

Q: What is the difference between passion and love, from your point of view?

Passion is a specific form of love in which the person in love becomes passive and has his will captured by the adored object. It is the worst illness that can strike the human soul. Eliphas Lévi (1855/2001) and Plato explain this well. A basic prerequisite for this emotional illness to take hold is that the other person be in a better position than ours. We fall in love only with someone who is in a position superior to ours and who does not need us.

Q: What does a man mean when he says he is in love?

That he is desperate for that woman, that he cannot live without her and cannot bear her absence. He is a childish wretch.[14] He is no different from a little boy crying for his mother.

Q: Why do you men get married if you consider marriage garbage and accuse women of being perverse manipulators? Just to have safe sex all the time?

[13] Since he can leave her at any moment.

[14] I chose to replace the expression “imbecile,” which appeared in the first online edition, with “wretch,” which seems more accurate to me.

Yes. And also to have a decent woman at our side. Since that is harder and harder to find, we run away when we smell commitment, because marriage is a trap most of the time.

Q: Why do you men want to die when a woman betrays you sexually, but do not care much when she betrays you only emotionally?

Because when you women give sex to another man, you do what you never did for us in bed. For example: for her lover, a woman does everything, oral sex, anal sex, etc., of excellent quality, with eagerness, affection, and love.[15] For her husband she never does it the same way, because sex in marriage is an obligation and, therefore, a torture. In other words: the best she has, the woman reserves for the other male, who does not commit, and not for the committed wretch.[16] A man will not suffer if he is not in love with the woman who went off with another man.

Q: Why do you men want to die if you cannot have sex for lack of an erection?

Because we feel annulled as men. The guy feels that he no longer exists, because a man is a walking penis; the rest is an attachment.[17] That is why we need to have plenty of sex while we have the strength for it.

Q: This sentence is yours: "There is a difference between the weak man, who does this against his own will for fear of losing the woman, etc., and the strong man, who does this because he does not need her. Only the latter can enjoy her affection." Explain it.

The point is that the strong man does not identify with the relationship. He is inside the relationship but remains psychologically outside and isolated. So he lets the woman act freely so as to discover who she is and what function she serves. The weak man, on the other hand, lets the woman do what she [15] I am neither defending nor condemning such practices, but explaining that this is one of the factors that torment betrayed husbands. For the husband, sex is the most precious thing his wife has, and the act of giving it in the best possible way to another man wounds his feelings painfully. The husband wants total exclusivity of his wife's erotic performance.

[16] I likewise chose to replace the expression "idiot," which appeared in the first online edition, with "wretch," which seems more accurate to me.

[17] On this point, see Eugene Monick (1993A; 1993B).

wants for fear of losing her.[18]

Q: Do you men want a woman who guesses your needs without your telling her, as a mother does for a small child?

No. We want a relationship that is explicitly defined from the start, so we do not waste time waiting for what will not come. That is why the weaker men kill women, assault them, etc.: because they expect one thing and get another. Being feeble, they cannot properly exercise dominance over the woman by mastering themselves, and the only way out they find is aggression. Obviously they are wrong; they should grow up and become real MEN, but they are not entirely to blame, because in our society there is no one to teach them how to be men. Today the fashion is to be homosexual and "sensitive." Masculinity is seen as a defect because we live in a decadent society (...).[19] The most we see are tough guys who think that masculinity lies in the muscles of their arms and legs. They are ignorant, because masculinity lies in the brain, in the heart, and in the sexual organ.

Appendix 2. Correspondence

Dear friend

I see that the basic condition for mastering it[20] has not yet been achieved. It is very clear that you have feelings for her and are thrashing about, disoriented, in search of liberation.

The first thing you need, before anything else, is to stop liking this woman. It is very obvious that she is important to you, and she perceives this. When you try to feign disinterest, the woman quickly finds out whether or not you are pretending, so this is no use. What is most necessary, first of all, is to truly stop liking her.

Second, you must be contradictory. Instead of trying to please, speak to her in a determined, deep, protective tone of voice. Treat her as if she were a girl of about ten or twelve. Beware of any possible communication of submission through your [18] That is, the motivations are different in the two cases. However, there is a third case: that of the weak man who tries to forbid. The women then get around all the prohibitions and enjoy the feeling of triumph, mocking the incompetence of the would-be petty dictator.

[19] Masculine values are ridiculed, are the object of prejudice, and have been suffering progressive attempts at destruction by modern Western society. On this particular point, see Farrell & Sterba (2007), Hise (2004), Monick (1993A), Sommers (2001), Young & Nathanson (2002), and Young & Nathanson (2006).

attitudes, voice, topics, etc. Take on the role of the one who leads the relationship. At the same time, keep your distance to preserve the mystery. Oscillate: tighten the contact, come closer, talk, and keep away. Alternate, alternate, alternate...

She is playing the classic game of indefiniteness. She wants to keep you tied to her while giving nothing in return. For her, then, everything is just fine, since there is no doubt to disturb her. She does not see you as a victor to whom she should surrender, because she sees you as a young man in love because he is immature. It is necessary to reverse this image by taking another position and other behaviors.

Be careful not to become polarized in coldness. The ideal is to be colder and, at the same time, more affectionate than she is. Try to combine opposite characteristics: be distant but protective, indifferent but understanding. Get her to talk about herself, about her problems, and make them the agenda of your conversations, in which you will then make suggestions and give guidance like someone who understands the problem better than she does.

It is not your disinterest she should perceive but your superiority,[21] and that is different. If your only concern is to show disinterest, you will lose the game, because there will be no real emotional basis on your part. First achieve disinterest within yourself, so that afterward it reveals itself blended with care.

The important thing is to mark her mind as a man different from all others, a man whose equal she will never find again. If you are submissive and try to please, do things the way she wants, etc., you will not be different, because that is what everyone does. To be different, you must do what no man does: give orders (affectionately), take the initiative, surprise her with unexpected attitudes, not be afraid to touch or kiss her, not be disturbed by little games, and, above all, always seek her out for sex.

To stop liking her, I suggest you see her as the same as the others. That way you free yourself from this spell that makes you believe she is the best in the world.

Hello, friend

[21] In the field of inner attributes (understanding, firmness, self-mastery, etc.)

These attitudes you have been considering are very interesting, especially if you turn your back right afterward. It might also help to speak to her in a deep but affectionate tone of voice.

In situations like this, we have to find something that impresses, perhaps even an act or a remark that "horrifies" her if we have no other resource. The important thing is to make her think about you, to impress her. (...) But one must be careful, because this depends a great deal on the individual personality of the person. For each woman there is a different way to impress.

It seems to me you are doing well. I think it would be good to confuse her a little more. I suggest a bold compliment accompanied by indifference.

However, there are dangerous feelings there. I see in you a little hope that she may be a woman different from the others. It is this hope that kills us. Be careful.

The fundamental thing is to be ever bolder in your advances and at the same time ever more indifferent. Watch her reactions and follow them as you go.

I did not intend to continue, but, seeing the need, I will do so for now. Exceptionally, I will allow myself to stray a little from our objects of study to deal at length with useless personal matters, in this e-mail only. In the next ones (if you reply), I will completely ignore any of your futile remarks about my person and focus exclusively on the topics, despite your possible clamor.

Your inability to understand what I say, and your tendency to falsify and distort everything, are evident. Your way of studying is utterly confused, and the ideas mingle in an infernal and passionate pandemonium. Clarity is nonexistent in your writing, and the refusal to adopt it is constant. There is also the inability to relate my present statements to points you yourself raised over several past e-mails. Moreover, you, young lady, avoided countless points I raised in my messages, and of course I will not waste my time chasing after them, since the points avoided were precisely the crucial errors in your thinking. Such facts only reinforce my observations about women's inability to argue.

Do not confuse good argumentation with your emotional, manipulative attacks, because the difference is visible and it would be ridiculous.

You, young lady, should not condemn the analytical content of my messages or waste time sabotaging the study with passionate remarks about my person. If you do not have the ability to send back replies with the same level of objectivity, depth, and scope, that is your problem.

At no point have I failed to answer questions when they were formulated to be answered. What I refuse to do is take part in the mental, emotional, and written pandemonium into which you incessantly want to draw me with your magnetism. If you want objective answers, ask objective questions instead of tossing stray ideas about me in a bewildered, colorful, but highly magnetic brainstorm. I will by no means run after your confusions to undo them. If you want clarity, formulate your questions correctly.

In reading your messages, among the various confused and lying points, what stood out to me was your false claim that I spoke out against the kundalini. In none of my messages did I take a stand against this energy, but rather against the positions favorable to the castration of the male, with which you people (...) sympathize.

I now challenge you, young lady, to show me in which message I spoke out against the kundalini.

I did, yes, speak out against this whole trend of eunuch pseudo-esotericists who proclaim that the kundalini rises when a man surrenders to passion and romantic love (that is, when they do not also say that the neophyte must, on top of that, abstain from sex). This is a barefaced lie of black magicians who poison minds with false teachings, and which you people clearly adopt, despite saying otherwise.

Victory over magnetism is granted precisely by the kundalini, since magnetism comes from the inverted action of this serpentine force. The reverse of the kundalini, represented in many cults by an evil serpent, is a negative polarization of this energy that comes from the sun and is fixed on the Earth by the force of gravity.

Both the kundalini and the kundartiguador, its reverse, originate from electronic fissions that occur in the stars and are fixed in nature and in the body. In its negative polarization, this trans-electronic energy manifests itself in the form of fatal, natural, animal, and necessary magnetism. The egos are granulations of this force. Do you, madam, by any chance understand what this is?

One of the basic attributes for awakening the kundalini is not surrendering to the fatality of feminine magnetism. Only after much experience with women does a man acquire this capacity. One must experience in depth all the fallacy and lies of the ego and of its games and disguises in the love relationship. Only he who has verified the illusory nature of romantic love will be able to direct it and make use of it for spiritual ends. That is why cads and prostitutes are closer to the authentic chastity that leads to the superhuman state than timid masturbators and castrated, inorgasmic women. At no point have I considered "cads" and prostitutes to be on a par with the authentic man. However, they are people who experience evil[22] in all its fullness, and therefore understand it better than the naive souls who believe themselves pure.

It is known that when demons rise up from the abyss, they become the grandest gods. This happens because they discover that evil is not as attractive as it seems. People who have walked an exhausting path of romantic and sexual disillusionment narrow down their choices, becoming more and more demanding in their selections, and are, obviously, accused of being prejudiced. As they develop, they increasingly opt for quality instead of quantity, until they reach the point of having only one person. None of this means emotional surrender to the other, but rather emotional surrender to one's own Inner Being: spiritual learning.

In all our messages, we have dealt with love in its lower forms. We have not concentrated on the study of Love in its original and higher modality. We have dealt only with its egoic perversions.

The ignorant, like you, suppose that the transmutation of energy provides no kind of sexual pleasure. They stupidly believe that chastity is the same as celibacy, abstinence, and inorgasmia. They do not know that the rise of the energy through the sympathetic channels generates an anti-orgasmic ecstasy of an intensity even greater than vaginal orgasm. Hence the woman who transmutes is not inorgasmic (or anorgasmic), as you (...) pride yourselves on being, but anti-orgasmic, and that is completely different. Such women experience an inverted orgasm,[23] something you will never understand. I compared it to vaginal orgasm in terms of intensity of pleasure and ecstasy, but not in terms of the direction of the energy flow. Stop being ignorant. If (...) you really knew the subject, you would not assert so much nonsense, which you probably heard from pseudo-masters.

It is also worth informing you that the "merits of the heart" are not hypocritical romantic feelings, as you imagine, but precisely the opposite. They are total devotion to the Divine Spirit as opposed to the worship of the earthly woman, a worship that constitutes a crime against Christ and the Divine Mother. Fornication and romantic love are siblings. Worshiping an earthly woman as the only one and as a goddess is idolatry. The rites of worship of woman in the esoteric cults are not directed at the external, earthly woman, as (...) [you] show you believe, but at the Divine Woman. It is stupid to worship the image instead of worshiping the Divinity it represents.

Your claims to know the kundalini on an experiential basis are ridiculous: a person who truly has the kundalini awakened is immune to atomic radiation. Are you by any chance immune to atomic radiation? Such a person is also immune to every kind of infection. Are you, by any chance?

As for me, I am a simple rational ape who aspires to be an authentic man one day. I do not have the kundalini awakened. I have not yet acquired the capacity to retain my semen continuously (...) [since you asked].

Our points of disagreement were never about the kundalini, but about other things: emotional surrender to the other, female infidelity, and the maturity of "cads" compared with naive men. At no point did we explore the topics of the need for monogamy and the loss of sexual energy through seminal emission. Therefore, young lady, you have no basis whatsoever for slandering me in this way, claiming that I am against the kundalini. And if at any point I failed to address some point you raised, it was because it was an attempt on your part to divert the dialogue from our main objective to merely personal and passionate matters. Furthermore, the points I raised and you, madam, avoided were many, such as, for example, rape among confined animals under sexual stress and women's tendency to imitate men, among others.

I will now keep the study focused on the topic of the kundalini until its end. Do not waste time trying to lure me into digressions, because I will ignore them. Talk about the subject of our interest and not about me.

Sincerely

Dear friend

The basic characteristics of the Authentic Man are the absence of the ego and the possession of the inner vehicles of fire, which grant him the status of king of nature. The basic characteristics of the Superman are the absence of the seeds of the ego (the memories of desire) and the possession of the inner vehicles of gold, which grant him the capacity to live in the Absolute.

[8/8/2004 11:40:21

Dear colleagues

We have reached the end of the series of our interesting messages. Our study was very fruitful and gave me many insights. The ideas contained in this message arose during our dialogues some time ago and were already waiting to be sent long before the worst confusions, which is why I send them now and bring the study to a close.

There is no inconsistency whatsoever in the fact that a woman resists while surrendering. Through resistance, she finds out how capable the man is of enchanting her, attracting her, and dominating her. A woman resists precisely so that the man will break her resistance;[24] that is what she wants. If the man is not able to overcome her, she will simply explain the fact to herself through the idea that he was not good enough and that, therefore, she will not miss him.

This is something absolutely natural, part of the dynamics of the species. It is interesting to observe women feigning disinterest and pretending that they do not need men, with the unconscious intention of inducing them to pursue them. Consciously, they assume that male desire for them is always a certainty and that, if at a given moment they are not having sex with someone, it is simply because they did not want to.

Women carry the belief that all they have to do is lift their skirt or open their neckline to have each and every man chasing after their body and their sex; that is, that they are irresistible. They avoid the disturbing idea that only the most desperate, rejected, and therefore uninteresting men will accept them. They also avoid the idea that when men look at their necklines and legs, they are evaluating them. They generally assume that they are already being desired when, often, men are merely trying to find some interesting element in their physical body but are not finding it.

Feigning disinterest allows the human female to identify the best male specimens for reproduction and offspring: those who are not affected by her pretense because they have many desirable females available.

When a woman discovers that she is sexually rejected by a man who desires several other women, but not her, she is, if the rejection is real and not feigned, wounded in her self-esteem and comes to need to be courted by this man. She then tries to hit him and wound him through cynicism and sarcasm to get his attention, often trying to make him feel small. If she perceives that he finds these attempts amusing instead of being bothered by them, she will be totally vanquished and surrendered. It is something very curious to observe.

Obviously, men hide everything I have been telling you. A man would never tell you all this if he wanted to win you over and take you to bed. On the contrary, he would excite your fantasies and passions, letting you believe whatever you pleased, and would lead the process all the way to madness and total surrender.

The game of passion allows nothing other than to dominate or be dominated. Love, as you understand it, that is, romantic love, will victimize one side or the other. The one who loves more, within this type of love that you preach, will be the one who obeys, feels jealous, and is afraid of losing. The one who loves less will be the one who is more secure and master of the situation. That is why women do not like mushy, emotional men. They say they like them, but in reality they do so only to evaluate them, because they detest them.

The man in love becomes defenseless before emotional games, an expression of the female animal nature whose purpose is to select the best breeder and protector for the offspring.

Because they are opposite and complementary, men can bear sex without love but cannot bear love without sex, while women can bear love without sex but cannot bear sex without love. Moreover, male love needs to be active and female love passive. An active love is detached, and a passive love is attached and therefore romantic and exclusivist. Falling in love is not admissible for a man but is indispensable in a woman.[25] That is all I had to tell you.

Sincerely

Colleague

My intention had been to help, an intention I will not have again. I will merely continue the fruitful (despite the intolerance) study we have been doing. Obviously I will publish all of my writings.

With her lover, a woman lives a fairy tale. Her need for intense emotions continually drives her to seek the role of the princess waiting for Prince Charming. When the lover becomes a husband, he automatically becomes the villain of a new tale. The one responsible for this is close and continuous living together, which eliminates the possibility of fantasizing and makes the princess grow used to the prince, now her husband. To keep meeting the need of her soul, the princess then turns the former prince into a villain and keeps waiting for the man of her life, a wait that will never be fulfilled for the simple reason that this man does not exist in real life, but only in her fantasy.

The subtlety of female betrayal makes it very difficult, almost impossible, to get it admitted when there is no catching in the act, a fact that irritates men. It is clothed in a magnificent, impeccable, innocent, and spiritual aura, which it would be sacrilege to doubt: the pure intimacy with a friend with no ill intent, the admiration "without intention" for some male figure or other, famous or not, accessible or not. For this reason, experienced men consider all the women who fall into their arms in love to be unfaithful until there is strong proof to the contrary. They distrust those who swear sincerity and surrender to them more than those who admit to being prostitutes: the latter do not lie and pose no danger, their nature is already wide open, revealed; the former hide the traps. The more sentimental surrender is requested, the more suspicious the man will become.

A woman's strength lies precisely in her fragility. Her delicacy, sweetness, and tenderness break and subdue male physical strength. We men can be considered tamed, domesticated beasts of burden. We are tamed by our own desires and feelings.

When we master our inner animals, we master females by extension. When we are mastered by them, females dominate us. The kings of the inner animals are called feeling, passion, and desire. One cannot be victimized by a force and at the same time subdue it.

Delicate, tender, and sweet women are intensely magnetic, especially when they are voluptuous. Males in a cruder state fight and kill each other over them, because they are primitive and unconscious. The superior man resists their fascinations in infinite forms, and they surrender.

The denials and excuses that women invent for their sorceries are merely the rearguard of the bewitchment. Whenever a man surrenders to feminine magnetism, a terrible misfortune befalls him. In some cases he loses all his money; in others he abandons his home, fascinated by the witch; he may also lose all his vital energy, contract sexually transmitted diseases, or simply let himself be dominated and miserably debased.

Some women agree with my ideas because they think of their sons, husbands, boyfriends, brothers, and fathers exposed to the danger of fatal feminine magnetism and fear that they will be swept away by the magnetic hurricane and be lost. Not all of them try to hide reality by pretending to be offended, but the general tendency is to disagree, as would be natural.

Sincerely

Hello

I believed it, because you had said you would not deceive me.

The tactic in question[26] was not written for you, but only for men to have fun and laugh. It was put forward in a tone of joking and irony, as you women do with us.

Vaginal orgasm can be distinguished from clitoral orgasm by the intense emotion it provokes: an intense fear seizes women who experience it the first few times. It also tends to provoke crying. It is this type of orgasm that provokes female ejaculation, as was proven in the '90s, with the emission through the urethra of a liquid composed of enzymes and very similar to male semen.

The kundalini does not come from coldness and sexual apathy, as eunuch pseudo-spiritualists, false "Gnostics," and Theosophists suppose. It results from [26] "Let us now look at a very funny strategy for shy and complex-ridden men to manage to win women: When a man goes out accompanied by a beautiful woman, the other women start flirting with him because they feel belittled. Human females are highly competitive. Therefore, all it takes is to pay a beautiful friend to appear in public with us, and the others quickly become interested, wondering about our attractions. Obviously, the women who read this will deny everything and deplore this amusing strategy, but it works" (message posted on a personal blog on 8/3/2004 at 00:46:32).

the intense and directed quickening of sexuality. The sexual organs are small generators of energy. When aroused, they provoke great explosions of force. If this force is correctly directed, it can be turned inward and upward instead of being expelled outward. But to do so, it is first necessary to learn to detonate the generator button, that is, to light the bonfire of sex. This entails intense arousal counterbalanced by resistance to the centrifugal tendency, so as to guide the process in the direction of ecstasy. However, this ecstasy is completely different from animal ecstasy, in which the energies are lost. It is an anti-orgasm, or an inverted orgasm.[27] Neither those who are apathetic toward sex nor those fond of fornication (climax with the loss of semen) experience it.

The kundalini rises slowly and not suddenly, as the New Age ignorant suppose. For it to rise, it is indispensable that the student free himself from the fatal attractions and seductions of woman and, at the same time, intensify his eroticism. This means subduing, intensifying, and directing the instinct instead of weakening it, which is only possible through the death of the ego.

The animals mentioned would commit rape if they were confined with females in the same space. Obviously they do not know that word, because animals do not speak Portuguese.[28]

This message will be published on my blog, because it is mine. No word or letter of your authorship will ever be made public by me again.

Interesting.

I believe you really would not deceive me.

On involution: there are degrees and degrees. I never imagined that you were at the lowest level. My comments refer to the average state of humanoids, including myself. Since you young ladies are not from another planet, I thought I could include you.

The adorable girls referred repeatedly to sex as something secondary to love, going so far as to glorify themselves for their inorgasmia.

[27] It is not a matter of feeling the orgasm and simultaneously retaining the semen, but of truly sacrificing the orgasm, a merely animal function, in order to experience another type of ecstasy: the spiritual one.
[28] This refers to a question about the occurrence of rape among animals.

Some females, including human ones, kill their young because of physiological changes arising from pregnancy and childbirth that affect their neurological systems. There are many females that do not do so.

Animals follow mating rites with very strict selective criteria. Rape terrifies any female animal, just as any other violent act does. There is no permissiveness.

The currently accepted theories of evolution do not claim that man descends from the monkey, but rather that both descend from common ancestors.

The genetic similarity between humans and flies reinforces the thesis of man's animality. We do not combine enough behavioral, physiological, or genetic peculiarities to be classified in another kingdom. We are primates, mammals, and vertebrates.

Esteemed reader

Very interesting. Little by little we are reaching the synthesis.

Proof could only be obtained after lengthy observation and comparison of behavior, which is impossible for us.

In these matters, it is worth analyzing not only the differences but also the similarities between rational animals, irrational animals, and Man. Of all animal species, the humanoid is the one best suited to the expression of the consciousness of the Spirit in the physical world. Even so, it differs completely from the Authentic Man and the Superman.

The various complexes and psychic aggregates originate in our irrational animal past. When we acquired a rational mind, we strengthened them with our abstract mind (mechanical imagination). The result is the aberrations that we are, because we stagnated and began an involutionary regression instead of continuing on the path toward man. In the past, there existed truly human civilizations, but they were lost; they disappeared.

We believe we are human because we wear clothes, speak, have technology and feelings, and walk on two legs. These are erroneous criteria.

Feel free to disagree at any time.

Hello

I understand... I thought it had been unintentional... so much the better, then.

I hope the confusion surrounding the messages has been cleared up. I will lay out the topics gradually. Little by little, I think we are coming to understand each other.

In my case, I would only give credit to your alleged superiority if I lived with the people in question to verify how they react in various situations. I know many mythomaniacs who believe themselves transcended and think they have eliminated the ego.

He who has totally freed himself from the animal state does not have the common reactions of sadness, fear, gluttony, greed, etc. This liberation is also revealed by the submission of other animals: birds and fish do not avoid him, and wild beasts do not attack him.

The subtlety and dissimulation typical of woman camouflage her animality very well. That is why it is very easy for women to condemn males as brute animals. In truth, woman is as much an animal as man, but her animality expresses itself in a delicate way. Look: animality is not a synonym for brutality or coarseness. There are many delicate animals. Animality needs to be identified on the basis of the manifestation of the instincts. Among the animalistic female instincts are maternal love, the craving for chocolate, the fear of rape, jealousy, the various complexes, the procedures for selecting the male, etc.

We have a lot of prejudice against the poor animals because of our ignorance. They are merely part of nature. We do not know the animal psyche, assuming that animals have no feelings or consciousness, which is absurd, because that will depend on the species. The animals closest to man, including here the rational humanoid, have feelings of various kinds.

What distinguishes the humanoid animal from the other animals is not feelings but the abstract mind: non-humanoid animals cannot abstract ideas, that is, connect mental images in the absence of the object. As for man, he is identified by resistance to magnetism in its various forms and by the possession of inner bodies of fire.

Hello

These men who get hooked without sex are generally infantilized in the relationship, binding themselves to the woman through the feeling of attachment. For fear of "losing mommy," they pretend to bear such torture, although they almost always give vent to their instincts on the sly.

Those who fall in love "with the flesh," as you say, usually see in the woman some physical characteristic that fascinates them and that, if lost, will cause them to disconnect. The more "beautiful" the woman is, within the man's conditions for getting beautiful women, the more magnetic she will be. That is why men do not look at older women or at those considered "ugly." Those who do are the ones who feel rejected and become less demanding. The basic, prejudiced logic is: the greater a man's social prominence, the more beautiful the women he will get. However, if they are indifferent to sex, resistant to eroticism, or consider it dispensable, they will be disqualified in his estimation and can be replaced.

The man truly in love sees the woman as a goddess, a superior being who must be worshiped so as not to be lost. He trembles at the mere thought that his image before the goddess might be compromised for a second and that he might be abandoned. He is easy prey. When a woman senses that a man is in this state, she sets about managing this feeling, exciting his passion and never satisfying it. In these cases, women do not give affection and do not surrender, because they know instinctively (and here again we see the animal: instinct) that if they do, the man will come out of that passive state. A woman only surrenders and gives full affection when she fears that the man does not love her or rejects her sexuality for other, more interesting females. However, if the man allows the relationship to become polarized in coldness, the woman will likewise grow cold. Hence the solution is to alternate between opposite behaviors, an ability available only to the man who is free of passion, and to manage the woman's feelings, pretending to do what she wants in order to please her, but not always doing it.

It is normal for a woman not to agree with any of this, reacting and trying to prove the contrary, because there is an immense distance between her real behavior and what is verbally accepted. What would be abnormal is for you to agree. It is not through explicit speech that we discover what goes on in women's hearts, but through observing their attitudes and the "between the lines" of their discourse. Explicit speech is the great weapon of the female [sex] for deceiving the male.

The woman of today normally does not accept a man's sexual impulse, considering it "erroneous" or "inferior" in itself, because she is degenerate.[29] Instead of praising the beauty of the instincts, her infra-sexuality leads her to reject the principal masculine mark, on the grounds that asexual love would be superior.[30]

So long.

Dear madam

The observations were directed at the various questions raised by your group. The fact is that the e-mails were in chaos, and a masculine attitude organizing the study was needed. You have brilliant and important ideas, but you mix them together, and as more of them arise, the study gets lost. I also had to make the change because many of the replies were merely emotional appeals and aimed, without any conscious intention on your part, to induce me to chase after the possibility of "defeating you." So I changed the course of the work and defused the magnetism of the replies.

Compare my last e-mail with the points raised in "Magnetism and the Ego" and with the answers to the questionnaire. You will see that my observations aim to address the questions you yourselves raised. As for the second questionnaire, it is on its way.

You have not grown dumber. The contradiction you point out is very real, because it is an adaptation to the inherently contradictory nature of the feminine. Not even women understand themselves; hence it is we men who must understand you, without expecting you to do so. I think that little by little you will understand, even without agreeing.

The belief that we are not animals generally signals a lack of knowledge about ourselves. When we are thrown into extreme situations, the disguised animal promptly reveals itself in all of us in the form of multiple variations of instinct: fear, gluttony, sadness, greed, etc. Animalistic traits may reveal themselves in a coarse way, when they are easily visible, or subtly. In the latter case they become more dangerous because they are more refined. All our egos are modifications of instinct by the abstract mind, and as long as we have them, we will be conditioned, mechanical creatures who move by instinct; that is, animals.

[30] However, being inherently contradictory, she feels attracted to the most promiscuous and to polygamous men.

There are many women who consider sex something erroneous and pride themselves on their inorgasmia and aversion to eroticism. Obviously they are going against nature and, above all, against masculine nature. The price they pay is loneliness and being relegated to the background in favor of more understanding women, who accept a man's sexuality better and, instead of protesting against the way things are, take the man by his own weaknesses and dominate men.

The love that you hide is only given to those who defeat you in your own domain: that of feeling. To receive it, besides the attributes that drive you crazy (which can be summed up as being different from other men), the man must not be victimized by the maddening feminine attributes, which can be summed up in three basic elements: beauty, voluptuousness, and affection. Only the men who overcome the powerful attraction of these three elements can have them at their disposal and enjoy them.

The idea of a supposedly egalitarian, bilateral, and reciprocal surrender is very beautiful but absurd. It is based on ignorance of the prevailing collective psychic conditions. On the real plane, we are monsters, animals, and demons with a humanoid appearance. We are monkeys with a high power of reasoning and, for this reason, dangerous beasts. There is no animal species more dangerous than ours.

Unfortunately, our precarious state of consciousness always leads us to believe the best about ourselves. This is a serious problem, because such a belief makes us stagnate spiritually. When we believe we have overcome the animal stage, we do not feel bothered by our condition, and, as a consequence, our efforts to develop inwardly in the direction of Man cease.

Subject: Magnetism - love and penis envy

Dear virtual friends

Our dialogues have been very rich. The topics brought up are gradually increasing, which makes a clearer and more organized approach necessary. I suggest that we stay on these two points before moving on to others. I will remain on the alert.

I will try to address all the questions raised as far as possible and will await your replies. Much of what was asked can be inferred from statements already made.

Penis envy is not something literal but metaphorical. A woman does not have a literal desire to have a penis, but merely a tendency to imitate men in their behaviors. The great collective changes and innovations start with men and are only later adopted by women. Men were the first to wear pants, followed by women a few centuries later; they got rid of earrings and cut their hair back in the 18th and 19th centuries, being imitated later by women. Today, human females have become masculinized and imitate males in practically every sector of activity, abandoning their homes, their maternal tasks, and the role they played in structuring and maintaining the family.

There are various kinds of love, one of which is passion. Passion is a type of love in which we surrender our heart and soul totally, without reservation, to the beloved. The highest form of love is the one in which we want and fight for the good of the other without placing our happiness in their hands. Since we are all animals, it is not sensible to cast pearls before swine. To surrender one's soul and heart to an intellectual animal is to condemn oneself to suffering. In order to help the wretched, suffering humanoid beings, among whom we include ourselves, we need, before anything else, to be invulnerable and superior[31] to them, to the extent of our capacities. Otherwise, it is we who will need to be helped.

The type of love generally offered by women is absolutely dispensable. What we men seek is precisely the kind of love that you refuse, hide, and reserve only for the supreme surrender. It is not in marriage that we will obtain it; we have to take it by storm, that is, invade the feminine soul like a hurricane, in an overwhelming way that breaks through all its resistances.[32] Deep down, what a woman wants is a man against whom women struggle and whom they are unable to resist. That is why they resist, torment, and test us so much. Resistance is part of the very process of surrender. Why is rape horrible? Because it is an invasion of the female body without permission, that is, without being preceded by the surrender of the soul. This surrender of the soul is not free of charge, as women would have it seem, because men pay a very high price. Indeed, they make it seem so in order to better select and choose their hero, the one who will come to carry them off in their hearts.

[31] Spiritually.

[32] Going along with, and not against, feminine fantasies. This invasion does not result from opposition to feminine desires but from an alliance with them. Then there is no way to resist.

An interest little centered on sex, a source of pride for many women, causes them not to fully correspond to the fantasies of males, which is why the latter remain in incessant search. It signals degeneration and involution rather than spiritual elevation, as some charlatan pseudo-esotericists suppose.

Animal nature is not the most interesting thing, but it is the reality that imposes itself on the overwhelming majority. To overcome it, one must first admit it, accept it. It has its place, its function, which needs to be recognized. The animal is not "wrong"; it merely needs to be tamed and directed. And this is the goal of the work with magnetism, the universal hypnotic current that sweeps along animals, plants, and the natural elements within the logic of creation.

Men and women are not superior or inferior to one another in an absolute way, but only in a relative sense, since certain functions are more developed in one or the other sex.[33] Thus the feminist claims of a supposed intrinsic superiority of the feminine are absurd and illogical. No one considers man inferior or dispensable when the house catches fire or when the burglar comes in through the window, as a writer whose name I do not remember said. We need not even go that far: when a cockroach appears in the bedroom, it is the man who is called.

I have tried to be comprehensive and cover the points raised. There is still much to say. However, I await replies and observations.

Dear friend

Yes, because what matters to a man is certainty. A man needs to dispel doubts.[34] Knowing this, the woman creates and preserves an indefinite state to prolong the doubt and immobilize us. That is why an "ultimatum" is important. In any case, you must create situations that corner her and force a definition that leaves no shadow of a doubt.

Here we see that a woman's love is often activated through rejection and not through insistence. The more we want them to love us, the less they love us.

There is also the question of the position each party takes. In general, women induce us to see them as prizes. They talk to us and treat us as if we needed them and they did not need us. Try to reverse this position by changing your feelings and the way you see her when you meet her. Try to feel that you are the prize, the payment, the object to be desired and pursued, and not the other way around.

Best regards

Dear reader

I consider that the best moment for the "attack" is when there is a favorable signal. This is the moment when the woman is open, vulnerable. The problem does not seem to be so much the moment as the manner of "attack." A wrong "attack" provokes rejection, so we have to know how to "attack." If she holds your gaze and does not look away, just move closer and kiss her. If she acts otherwise, then the type of "attack" must be different, thought out according to the situation.

She will probably be "vulnerable" when she gives you her phone number, when she talks with you about anything, etc. What matters is knowing what the opening is and making your move accordingly, so as not to overstep the limits.

Conclusions

It is advisable for a man to become emotionally independent of feminine influences so as not to lose control over himself.

Falling in love is a waste of time.

True love differs from passion.

Men lag behind in emotional intelligence.

A woman's emotional intelligence can render a man's intellect useless.

Fighting and arguing are a waste of time.

Harassing, running after, pursuing, forbidding, and pressuring are wastes of time.

It is not advisable to try to force women to stop being emotional.

It is not advisable to give the "ultimatum"[1] to a woman for whom we still have residues of romantic passion.

We must not nurture negative sentimentalisms of any kind (rancor, revenge, resentment, etc.).

We have to accept women as they are.

These are errors that must not be committed while reading this book: absolute generalization (believing that our postulates are universal, refusing to relativize and contextualize them), literalization (taking our ironies and denotations in a literal sense), partialization (considering only one side of the problems pointed out and refusing to recognize the other side of the contradictions), and extrapolation (extending our ideas to contexts and situations other than that of romantic relationships).

A piece of romantic trickery consists in allowing or inducing another person to fall in love with us so that, in their hope of being loved in return, they will do everything we want. We would not qualify as "romantic trickery" an intense passion that was returned with equal intensity and quality by the person who induced it. However, such a possibility seems to me a utopia.

The female mind and behavior are paradoxical because they encompass and allow the coexistence of mutually exclusive opposites, a fact that disconcerts men, who do not understand them, and leads them to consider them illogical, incoherent, confused, non-rational, and meaningless.

Non-rationality and illogicality correspond to forms of disconcerting logic and rationality that are not yet well understood.

Intelligence and intellectuality are distinct.

Adultery in modern Western civilization is not a behavioral exception, a fact that almost totally empties marriage and emotional commitment of meaning.

[1] Communication of a last, radical attempt to restore the relationship before abandoning the relationship for good

We propose the following lines of defensive and anti-manipulative action: 1) mirror action; 2) cornering action; 3) refractory action, or non-action; 4) unmasking action. Refractory action is the noblest and highest of all. As the reader, my friend, must have noticed, the art of dealing with women who fit the profile pointed out in this book consists in giving them back the effects of their own attitudes. It consists, in some cases, in treating them as they treat us (mirror action) and, in others, in a manner superior (refractory action, more dignified and nobler) to the way they treat us. There is also, in some cases, the need to act so as to "wrest" definitions from them (cornering action) or to unmask their lies and trickery (unmasking action).

The feminine wiles used to win the war of passion and enslave us through love can be redirected back at the sly ones if we understand in depth how such strategies operate and what inner conditions are required. Women are born with such conditions, while men can develop them through experience.

The "war tactics" of this book come down to two points: 1) resisting the spell of passion and 2) accepting absolutely all of the woman's behaviors while also presenting her with the consequences. Both abilities can only be achieved through a disciplined and slow inner development. We must never fight against the woman, but against ourselves. Therein lies the key. While you fight against your own romantic weaknesses, she fights against hers. Whoever wins this war against himself will win the war of passion by extension. It is a game in which both compete to see who will be stronger in the struggle against their own feelings: attachment, passion, the need to be near, to seek the other out, to phone, the fear of losing, etc. What happiness it would be if both went far in this struggle and conquered themselves! Then manipulation and counter-manipulation would lose all meaning, and the contradictions of relationships between couples would move to other levels!

Those who try to control other people's behavior, curtail freedom, violate free will, force their neighbor to do what he does not want to do, etc., are far from understanding what this book proposes. The proposal here is one of total freedom: leaving the woman absolutely free to do whatever she pleases with her life (but not with ours) and thus to show who she really is. What matters is to relate to the true person hidden behind the appearance, and not to a figure idealized by our desires and passions.

Those who nurture negative passions, such as resentment and revenge, are equally far from understanding our message.

If the reader is fortunate enough to find a truly virtuous woman, sincere and honest in her feelings, there will be no ruse or wile to be returned or dismantled. Then, if he is worthy of this virtuous woman, he will have reached paradise.

About the author:

The author of this work IS NOT A PSYCHOLOGIST; his professional training is in another field. He IS NOT A MASTER and DOES NOT WANT DISCIPLES OR FOLLOWERS. He IS NOT THE LEADER OF ANY RELIGION. He simply likes to think freely about the question of love and believes he has that right. His opinions are PROVISIONAL AND INDEPENDENT. The author published his ideas only so that people would study and discuss them critically, and he recommends that people read other books on the subject. His ideas are merely a starting point for deeper study and bridges to other authors and other points of view. He DOES NOT GIVE ORDERS; he only makes suggestions, which should be received critically.

The author asks readers NOT TO PESTER HIM with questions, because everything is already very well explained in his books, nor to BOTHER HIM by insisting that he take part in biased groups. He wants neither fans nor admirers; he wants only CRITICAL, REFLECTIVE, AND STUDIOUS READERS.

The author DISAPPROVES of the formation of any groups claiming to represent him or his ideas. There is no group or institution, anywhere in the world, virtual or not, that represents this author. Obviously, there may be groups with points of view similar to his, but, definitely, none of these groups represents him. All those who claim to be his disciples are IMPOSTORS and should be unmasked.

Glossary

This glossary was added to the English edition and is not part of the Portuguese original. It lists the author's key concepts that appear in this book, with the original Portuguese term and the English rendering used throughout the translation.

alpha male (macho alfa) — The dominant male of ethology, as used in discussions of attraction.

alternation (alternância) — The deliberate oscillation between coldness and affection, attributed by the author to feminine emotional games and recommended to men, following Lévi, as a way of crossing and alternating one's action.

Authentic Man (Homem Autêntico) — The true human being, as opposed to the ordinary humanoid: one who has eliminated the ego, resists magnetism in its various forms, and possesses the inner bodies (vehicles) of fire. The author places the Superman one stage beyond him.

cornering (encurralamento) — The author's strategy of placing someone before a choice that exposes their real intentions.

counter-spell (contra-feitiço) — The return of a manipulator's influence to its source, which the author considers legitimate self-defense.

death of the egos (morte dos egos) — The inner work of dissolving the egos; for the author, the source of freedom from manipulation and of resistance to all passions.

dominance (vs. domination) (domínio (vs. dominação)) — The author distinguishes consented, protective leadership in the relationship, which he endorses, from coercive domination of another's mind or will, which he rejects.

enchantment (encantamento) — Fascination produced through pleasure and desire (flattery, seduction, promises).

freedom from passion (desapaixonamento) — The state of a man who has eliminated the egos of romantic passion and attachment, which the author presents as the precondition for not being dominated or tormented in love.

horrification (horrorização) — The author's term, after Eliphas Lévi, for making a strong and harmless impression on a woman by contradicting her convictions about what is beautiful or correct; never a threat or real danger.

humanoid (humanóide) — The author's term for the ordinary human being: a rational animal driven by instinct and by the ego, which merely has a human appearance and has not yet become an Authentic Man.

indefiniteness (indefinição) — The deliberate refusal to define a relationship (friend, lover, girlfriend, wife), kept up to preserve doubt and to prolong the man's interest and pursuit. The author advises answering it with ultimatums or by turning it back against the woman.

kundalini (kundalini) — The serpentine sexual energy that, in the esoteric tradition the author follows (Samael Aun Weor), rises through the spine

mirror effect (efeito especular) — The return of a repelled spell or manipulation to the one who cast it.

passions (paixões) — In the classical philosophical sense: desires, fears, and attachments that sweep the will along, not only romantic love.

passive element, active element (elemento passivo, elemento ativo) — The author's technical names for the one who is manipulated and the one who manipulates.

psychic aggregates (agregados psíquicos) — Samael Aun Weor's term for the egos understood as autonomous psychological formations within the psyche.

psychic standstill (parada psíquica) — The paralysis of thought that comes from searching for the perfect reply in the middle of an argument.

self-defense (legítima defesa) — For the author, the only case in which dismantling another's manipulations, or returning them, is justified.

sympathetic affinity (afinidade simpática) — The bond of sympathy created by the convergence of desires and attitudes.

ultimatum (ultimatum) — In the author's strategy, a final demand that forces a definite decision.

unconscious prostitution (prostituição inconsciente) — The author's name for what he describes as an ancestral, unacknowledged tendency of females to give themselves to the males with the greatest resources or social standing, drawing on Calligaris's psychoanalytic account of the prostitution fantasy.
