Warning

This work should be read in a spirit of humor and solidarity, never in a spirit of revolt.

This book teaches men the art of dismantling and neutralizing female wiles in love and of protecting themselves against the emotional damage of passion, and it cannot be invoked as an incentive for, or as support for, any form of aggression.

Its critical, direct, ironic, and incisive tone reflects only the pointing out of flaws, errors, and wiles, and does not signify support for any attempt to cause harm to human beings. It is one thing to dismantle the acts of women who attack us in love and to criticize them in that domain. It is something else entirely to cause them harm.

The wiles denounced, unmasked, and described here correspond to feminine expressions, largely unconscious, of behavioral traits common to both genders. The profile outlined corresponds to a specific type of woman: the one who is ruled by sentimental selfishness. The author makes no pronouncement on the percentage of incidence of this profile among the female population of the various countries.

Nor does the author accept responsibility for misinterpretations, biased readings, undue generalizations, or intentional distortions that may be made under any pretext whatsoever, nor for misuse of this knowledge. Those who distort it or use it improperly will have to answer for their acts alone.

Introduction

Much has been written about the perfidy of men and little has been written about the perfidy of women. Without in any way denying the existence of a higher, wonderful, paradisiacal, and divine side in the feminine, nor the negative side of the masculine, I now come to try to make up for this lack by clarifying a little of what is missing.

There are two instances in woman: a higher one and a lower one. The higher side corresponds to the authentic Woman; the lower side corresponds to the animal humanoid female. People do not usually talk much about the wickedness of the animal female; it is a taboo. Anyone who dares to point out female cruelties and weaknesses is immediately labeled a mere backward, misogynistic male chauvinist. Unfortunately, women today are largely polarized negatively in their relationship with men, not always giving voice to the higher and good part that exists in them. The truly sincere ones, who also exist, are lost in the middle of the crowd and cannot be found easily because the sly ones pass themselves off as honest[1]. Since those who are not fit for marriage are deceitful and swear on their souls that they are faithful, honest, and sincere, the few who would be fit for a serious and stable relationship cannot be detected without great difficulty. Women (and men) who are sincere in love have never been abundant throughout history, but nowadays they are rapidly going extinct, disappearing swiftly due to the decadence and degeneration of our species[2].

[1] I am referring to honesty of feelings and not to the number of sexual partners. A woman who is not content with just one man and wants to have many partners cannot be accused of insincerity if she makes this very clear “in the contract,” that is, from the beginning.

[2] This decadence in love obviously also affects man, but it is expressed in a way different from the one that interests us here.

Women seem to me more prone than men to certain affective obsessions: they are unpredictable, contradictory, they change all the time, they never really know what they want, they desire incompatible things, and they do not always guide their behavior logically[3]. Their hormonal fluctuations, tendencies toward postpartum depression, bodily frailties, etc., are elements that must be taken into consideration when we judge their attitudes, which invariably obliges us to be indifferent to their cruelties and not to take them too seriously, forgiving them, on pain of suffering a good deal if we do not. He who does not accept them as they are, struggling uselessly against the inevitable, will lose his mind, for sadness drags us along when we chase after them. He who "runs after" female incoherence to try to reverse it by force is already chained without realizing it.

One obsession to which many are prone consists in obsessively wanting to be loved[4] without paying the corresponding price of giving love, certainty, and fidelity. It is a calculating selfishness that takes no account of the suffering caused to the other, very similar, in this sense, to the insane selfishness of men who take sex from women by force[5] or pressure them into giving in. Instead of protesting, it is better to forgive and accept, adapting ourselves to the real conditions offered to us and not nurturing any expectation that lies outside reality.

[3] However, these behavioral contradictions serve defensive (and sometimes offensive) purposes by paralyzing man's action.

[4] The obsession with the continuity of male interest, which Francesco Alberoni describes. It is an instinctive and natural tendency, a mechanism of the unconscious for preservation and dominance, for which woman can only be considered guilty when she remains passive before it. Women who assimilate this instinct become virtuous, sincere, and understanding, and are true pearls.

[5] This dark side of man gives rise to an ancestral resentment.

I acknowledge that many women (and men) will be furious with me for having written truths about women that they try to hide at all costs. Nevertheless, I tell the furious that I am helping women, for I denounce behavioral traits that harm not only their partners and suitors but also the women themselves. I point out the weaknesses of the female sex and of the male sex, as well as the means by which ill-intentioned men can break down women's resistance and overcome them, so it is evident that I am helping women to know themselves and to protect themselves against the baneful effects of their own wickedness. In addition, I provide experiential material so that they can advise and guide sons, brothers, and other male relatives against the dangerous magnetism of passion. Let it be added that I do not believe all women are bad. To the critics, I suggest that they refute my ideas instead of disparaging them.

I am a defender of monogamy, conjugal fidelity, and the family. I wrote this work for the sincere men who are defeated in the war of passion and cannot master the relationship with their wives, girlfriends, companions, and/or partners. My target audience is also the strong who do not fear the truth, the weak who want to strengthen themselves, and the brave who do not want to waste their time being cheated. In short: I write for those who like to think for themselves, who aspire to go beyond deceitful little games, and who seek a realistic relationship based on the raw truth and not on illusions, lies, deceptions, frauds, swindles, dreams, manipulations, and foolish romanticisms. Only these will do well when they apply my knowledge. Those who try to apply it for selfish purposes or with bad intentions, such as seducing in order to deceive, turning themselves into studly "alpha males," manipulating women, etc., will obtain results opposite to those desired. I do not write for immature people, who do not distinguish criticism from anger, who do not want a stable relationship, who are looking for someone to tell them what to do instead of thinking and deciding for themselves. I am not, nor do I wish to be, anyone's master; I seek neither disciples, nor admirers, nor followers. I seek only sincere and mature readers to question, in a sober and critical manner, the hegemonic beliefs and paradigms. If you are not one of these, close this book, because the message is not for you.

Our purpose is to discover woman's true feelings and intentions so as not to waste time with the insincere ones. Nor is it our goal to generate attraction in the indifferent ones, nor to conquer them, but rather to identify them quickly and dismiss them. We start from the principle that we must not run after those who snub or reject us, nor waste time trying to generate attraction in them. It is more efficient and quicker to find the less insincere ones.

I do not deny that males possess a dangerous shadow[6], but here the goal was to describe the shadow of the feminine, and I will not deviate from this purpose.

[6] I may explore the dark side of the masculine in more depth in the future, but I do not guarantee that I will.

1. Illogicality

Between the passionate feelings[7] of man and woman there is a perpetual mismatch arising from the fact that men who love are used as emotional slaves and the insensitive ones are loved. It is a strange contradiction: those women who lament that they are not loved are precisely the same ones who reject those who love them and prefer insensitive cads. This preference for playboys, cads, Don Juans, the powerful, the famous, leaders, etc., who do not fall in love and have many suitors and lovers at their disposal makes fulfillment in passionate love impossible. It is impossible for a person who adopts indifference as the criterion for choosing her object of love to be happy, by the very contradictory nature of her choice. Choosing the insensitive one as the ideal person for being happy in love is something like choosing, among several alternatives, a car as the ideal vehicle for crossing the ocean. It is, at first sight, illogical. Besides being illogical, it is baneful for women.

The fact that they choose those who reject them as objects of love seems, at first sight, to be proof that women are absurd, incoherent, and illogical. However, this is a question not yet satisfactorily resolved. I defend the hypothesis that such behavior is illogical only in appearance or up to a certain point, concealing a principle wholly coherent with calculating, opportunistic, and selfish conduct, though often unconscious: when they offer sex and love to the insensitive ones, they in fact do so moved by pride and by a thirst for power and dominance[8]. In other words: they are absurd, senseless, and illogical only in certain aspects of the problem. They are skillful strategists. The insensitive ones hold out the possibility of obtaining power and prestige because they are the ones who, in the short term, stand out above the good ones in the savage struggle for survival. This superiority is only apparent, for at the end of life men reap what they have sown, but it is enough to delude women, since they are often irrational[9], passionate, superficial, fickle, and easily affected by bad influences.

[7] We have to distinguish the lower emotions of amorous passion from true love, which is a sublime form of feeling.

[8] The predatory woman exercises dominance over man by means of his passion.

Polygamous, depraved, and promiscuous males excite curiosity and the desire to subdue them through love. Curiosity leads her to reason: "If he has several women, he must have something interesting. What could he have that attracts so many?" Pride will say: "Am I capable of making him fall in love and crawl for me?" And greed will make her think: "If I subdue him through love, I will have a slave to serve me and I will be treated like a princess." When the plan backfires and the war of passion is lost, then they complain and lament, laying all the blame on us and generalizing.

Insensitive, womanizing, distant, and cruel men are considered superior to the good, honest, faithful, and hardworking ones. Women, then, try to bend them and subdue them because they covet the position and status they could obtain in relation to rival females, who also desire them. When they do not succeed, because these men are tough, they start to lament. The laments are then outwardly expressed under a false garb of love and romantic sensitivity, and from this comes the erroneous and very common idea that all women are misunderstood affectionate beings who return love with love. On the real plane, merely affectionate love is generally returned with indifference, aversion, and infidelity, whereas coldness, determination, and command, if they take on protective features, are returned with attempts at subjugation by means of loving and ardently erotic affection. The fact that it is precisely the worst males who have the love of the most beautiful women at their disposal is a proof, rich in meaning, that there is no room for sincerity and goodness in the war of passion. Those less favored in beauty accept the nice guys because they feel rejected owing to their meager attractiveness. When we give them physical beauty, they are quickly transformed.

From the foregoing, we conclude that women's passionate love is born already condemned to non-fulfillment, by the simple fact that the criterion used for choosing its object is inaccessibility.

On the other hand, there is much that is truly absurd in this harmful selection criterion. Observing them, we see some authentic illogicalities that are not apparent, simulated, or deliberately provoked: those arising from the natural female propensity toward psychological confusion. They are involuntary, unconscious illogicalities, denied at all costs and incomprehensible because they are governed by mental chaos. These characteristics explain why an intense interest in, attachment to, and dedication to us suddenly disappears without the slightest warning and never returns. The lack of logical sense likewise makes comprehensible the absurdity of their wanting to be loved by cads. They are insanities that not even they can explain, and they have their origin in a rupture between their strong instincts and their intellects.

Trying to force them through argument to acknowledge their mistakes, to make logical decisions, to be transparent, to admit their dissimulation, etc., always has the opposite effect and does violence to their natures, obliging them to defend themselves. However evident the lack of internal logic in a badly told lie may be, such a fact will never be admitted, and melodramatic means of persuasion will prevail, transforming the discussion into an infernal pandemonium of confused ideas and insane feelings.

It will always be an absolute waste of time to try to make a person understand her own wickedness, the cruelties of her dishonest attitudes in love, and the reasons why she herself often makes herself unworthy of being loved. Discussions always turn into fights because the passionate mind has almost no objectivity that would allow the person to approach herself in reflective self-analysis. She will mix, chaotically, multiple unconnected subjects, treating all the points discussed passionately and superficially, not allowing any of them to be understood in depth. One hundred percent narcissistic, such people are incapable of seeing themselves as they are.

However, there are also feigned illogicalities, such as those that some women simulate when they want to make it seem that they do not understand something obvious, evident, notorious, and manifest. They will be addressed in the next chapter.

Ultimately, we conclude that we must reach an inner state in which we simply forget the problems and confusions that women create in tireless attempts to entangle us. Because there are real illogicalities and feigned illogicalities, it follows that there is no other path than indifference. Trying to force them to reveal what they feel, to define positions, not to lie, not to hide, not to manipulate, etc., can be very useful in certain desperate emergency situations, but it is, even so, to grant them importance and, therefore, to supply them with power, strength, and energy. The ideal is, therefore, complete neutrality: indifference to what they feel for us or for others, to the (un)truthfulness of what they say, to their attempts to deceive and manipulate.

2. Feigned misunderstandings

A common and very effective female ruse for escaping our psychological "cornering" consists in playing dumb about what we tell them while at the same time trying to inflame the discussion further by the emotional route. Since the other person's understanding is always necessary for a discussion to continue, the result is that in this way we are immobilized in the foolish attempt to make them understand our point of view. It is a foolish attempt for the simple reason that the refusal to show understanding already exists beforehand and is the very core of the manipulation strategy. Arguing or clashing with women is always a loss: if we defeat them, it will be a humiliation for us, because it is an act of cowardice; if we are defeated, it will be an even greater humiliation. Therefore, they are beings with whom one can hardly talk much during periods of conflict. It is no wonder that those who seek them out only for sex and ignore them the rest of the time do well.

A possible solution for these cases of feigned misunderstanding consists in simply ignoring the female point of view and setting out our ideas unilaterally. In other words: we win the argument when we do not argue. At a more refined level, we are capable of speaking very little most of the time. In any case, whenever there is a need to communicate something important and unpleasant, we must do so imperatively, ignoring the attempts to stir up controversy.

A typical feigned misunderstanding occurs when, feigning naivety, the sly ones pretend not to notice the explicit intentions of the males around them, refusing to acknowledge the implications of their shady and tolerant attitudes toward these men[10]. By feigning naivety, they remain safe from any unmasking.

Feigned misunderstanding protects them against a direct logical confrontation of ideas, which would oblige them to acknowledge their mistakes. It prevents us from discovering what the limits of their understanding are and, in this way, immobilizes us. Once again, we find here reasons to be indifferent to what they think and not to fall in love. Being free of passion, we will be indifferent. Being indifferent, our patience will multiply to infinity and we will not be afraid to create a definitive situation.

Difficult situations like these are true emotional puzzles and, once again, they can only be resolved by making unilateral, cornering decisions that leave them no way out.

[10] It is worth remembering that, since men are not saints, they always have ulterior motives, and this is no surprise to anyone. Here lies one of the reasons for the jealousy of husbands and boyfriends when their partners decide to grow more intimate with a “friend who means no harm.”

3. The shifting of decisions

Whoever decides something is always responsible for the consequences of his decision. Knowing this, your partner, if she is one of the sly ones we are dealing with, will refuse to take definite stances in the relationship, preferring to remain in the ambiguity of contradictory, double-meaning behaviors. Incoherence in the way they treat us, but not in the way we men treat them (sly ones!), is very much in their interest because it keeps them in control while we sink into the hell of doubt.

To preserve indefiniteness and thus safeguard the mystery, perpetuating our confusion and doubts, the sly ones flatly refuse to make decisions that have a definitive repercussion on the relationship. They never want to choose definitively between two paths, preferring to oscillate between both so as to enjoy the benefits of each while trying to dodge the unpleasant consequences inherent in them. That is why their attitudes never decisively define whether they want to be wives, lovers, casual flings, or cheats, for they want to enjoy the benefits that each of these positions offers without paying the corresponding price. When we protest, they try to induce us to make a decision we might regret later, because then they will be able to throw it in our face. The solution for these cases is this: create a definitive situation that obliges them to reveal unequivocally what they feel and how much they value us. Trying to force them through discussions to define themselves is a waste of time. The right thing is to find a right decision on our part whose result inevitably places them in a definitive situation, with no way out, obliging them to define themselves even if they do not want to. Then we must communicate that decision unilaterally, refusing discussion altogether.

As a general rule, sly women tend to withdraw from the relationship without cutting the man off definitively, because they want to keep him trapped afterward. To this end, they avoid explicitly taking on the responsibility that is theirs for the failure, implying that they are withdrawing through our fault. They perform ingenious maneuvers to get out while keeping the sucker imprisoned. This is the reason why they almost never have the courage to tell us to our face, clearly, objectively, and definitively, that they no longer want us, that they no longer feel anything, etc. They know that, if they do, we will benefit, because we will be able to give our lives another direction. It is a dishonest attitude, for it prevents us from turning the page and calmly going our way. They want to be remembered afterward; they want to feel, and to be able to say, that there is a rejected idiot who still loves them. Shifting decisions onto the other is an excellent mechanism for satisfying this sadistic selfishness.

4. The main psychological hell

We can define this psychological hell as a situation of intense emotional suffering arising from doubt and confusion regarding the feelings and fidelity of the person we love. Emotional suffering is something real; it exists objectively and can be verified by anyone.

What torments us most in love is not the possibility of being traded in, of being considered inferior to other males, etc., but rather the hell of doubt arising from ambiguous behaviors. What makes living together unbearable is not the “immoral” desires of the partner but rather the lack of honesty. A woman’s right to decide what to do with her own life, her own feelings, and her own body is untouchable and must always be respected. What is dishonest is the attempt to exercise these rights without bearing the inevitable consequences.

To dodge the natural consequences of a free sexuality, the sly females have specialized in the art of lying, dissimulating, and deceiving so as to enjoy certain benefits without giving up others. The result of this specialization was that they turned into walking lies, into people who can no longer live without hiding something from their father, boyfriend, fiancé, or husband. The only phase of life in which women like this are transparent and do not dissimulate is childhood. As soon as adolescence begins, the first concealments of behavior from the father begin, often even with the mother’s connivance. The first concealments prepare the adolescent girl to deceive, later on, the other men who will enter her life. They mark a preparatory phase in which the mother plays the role of initiator.

It is extremely painful to discover that the beloved woman is an insincere sly one who tries to put one over on us merely in order to feel better, cleverer, and hotter than her rivals. The act of taking pleasure in hoodwinking, manipulating, and deceiving a person who loves sincerely is extremely horrible because it abuses the noblest of feelings: love.

The main female strategy in these wars of passion is behavioral ambiguity. They speak and act contradictorily to confuse us and keep us from knowing what they really feel for us and what they want (for example, they usually say that they want marriage and commitment on our part but at the same time want freedom, or else, on the contrary, they say that they want an open relationship but demand love, affection, and feelings). They do this on purpose to disconcert us.

The solution for winning these battles is to create decisive situations that oblige them to reveal through actions what they truly feel, think, and want. Do not expect confessions or sincerity in words.

In love, what counts is not what is said but what is revealed through attitudes and concrete actions. Learn to see what is going on without needing to ask, without needing a confession. In cases of insurmountable indefiniteness, we have to be realistic and opt for the most probable conclusion: that the human being tends more readily toward selfishness and toward using others to obtain the maximum benefit. She, the sly one, will never admit that she flirted with, felt attracted to, or had sex with another man. Therefore, do without the confession and make your decisions on the basis of the first signs. If she really loves you, she will run to make up for the damage and try to prove her innocence (!). If she does not stir herself, then you will have lost nothing, since she was no good anyway. A woman who does not love is not worth a dime, and there are heaps of them everywhere. Cheats never deserve to be cried over and they do not even come close to sincere women, who are indeed worthy and precious.

If your partner is irrevocably strange, different, distant, arrogant, or cold, treating you badly, consider the relationship lost and take as much advantage of it as you can while it is possible. Do not waste time interrogating, wanting to know what is going on. Simply enjoy whatever good remains, until it ends. When she no longer wants to give you anything, simply leave her without giving any explanation, as this type of woman likes to do with us. Above all, do not argue, do not stir up controversy, do not fight, do not take revenge, do not try to prove that you are right, do not insist on your reasons, and do not explain your motives, because this will only make the situation worse.

Considering that dissimulation is the main tool of the sly ones, experience has been showing us that the guiding line that must lead good, sincere, and honest men in dealing with these women is the ability to discover what is hidden behind confusing, double-meaning behaviors. The whole strategy seems to come down to the ability to create decisive situations that allow no evasions or dissimulations. Doubt is our greatest enemy, and we must create situations to eliminate it, which demands a great deal of determination.

The hellish little games involving doubt aim to force us to show that we suffer terrible pangs of passion, crises of absence or of jealousy, and they are never acknowledged by the women who practice them. They take place in the half-light, in obscurity, while the sly woman acts as if nothing were happening or flatly denies everything when questioned, with the most brazen face. Confrontation is always avoided because it is clarifying. When we try to trigger it, the dialogue is diverted into subjective discussions, controversies, or capricious stubbornness that preserve the doubts, confusions, and indefiniteness. She will never tell the truth about what she feels, thinks, and does. Regardless of any consequences, she will never admit the obvious, which is why it is absolutely useless to engage in dialogue or to attempt open, explicit, sincere, and honest agreements. It is likewise a waste of time to demand clarifications or transparent, defined, coherent conduct, etc. The best thing is simply to observe them and make decisions on our own account.

It is very common that, after several days of stable treatment without conflicts, she suddenly withdraws some displays of affection to which her “victim” was accustomed. At the same time, she will keep up other affectionate acts to create an indefiniteness that confuses her partner. This is always done when we are not expecting it, at moments when things are going well, so that we are caught by surprise. The intention of this manipulative action is to force the man to show that he is suffering and is still in love. It is a periodic test aimed at measuring the degree of dependence and assessing passionate submission. If you become upset, you will show your suffering through body language and make her as happy as can be. The best solution for shattering this hellish little game is simply to withdraw in silence or to break off contact immediately after detecting the slightest sign of strange behavior. Then wait, wait, and wait. If she seeks you out, unmask her and definitively exclude from the relationship those very affectionate gestures that were denied you before. If she does not seek you out, be glad, for this means that by your side there was only a creature who was good for nothing but lying.

Precisely because they take place in obscurity, the hellish little games of feeling are difficult to detect, foresee, and combat. The difficulty is aggravated by the fact that our credulity (vote of confidence) in words is not recognized as a virtue to be repaid with sincerity. On the contrary, credulity is seen and exploited as an opportunity for them to deny everything that is happening and in this way to hoodwink us and keep us confused.

There are cases in which the man becomes irritated with his sly partner because of her superficiality, her insistence on taking up his precious time by offering “spiritual” affection, chatting uselessly about banal subjects instead of having intense, ardent, wild sex, etc. Sometimes it even happens that the man grows impatient with the affectionate way this type of partner looks at him. These bouts of impatience are due to freedom from passion and are felt as rejection. The curious thing is that, almost always, she insists on offering her love and remains in love as long as she is offered some glimpse of hope of reversing the situation. Whoever supposes that this insistence on breaking down rejection by offering affection is proof of the altruistic superiority of her feminine love is mistaken. What is really going on is that the manipulative female cannot bear to lose the wars of passion and tries to break down the male’s resistance so as to take revenge afterward, for what she seeks is simply to come out on top, to take possession of the situation. To keep her under control, it is enough to reject her and, at the same time, to offer her faint hope.

The games in the war of passion come down to concealing one's true intentions while discovering the other's real intentions. Whoever is more mysterious will confuse and, by being more realistic and observant, will win.

Besides the main psychological hell there are also other psychological hells in love. One of them is the well-known situation in which the person in love is pushed aside by the person he loves, while she has fun, as happy as can be, with other company and completely ignores his suffering. Only a complete revolution against the curse of passion can overturn the positions in these cases. The poor victim of the spell feels his strength slipping away, failing him, and does not feel the slightest will to fight against his decline. He suffers terribly, and there are cases in which he even gives himself over to drugs or alcohol or commits suicide. However, if he manages to gather his strength and fight until he is truly free of passion, with the help of God (may my atheist readers forgive me), he sees reality again, understands the monstrosity of which he was a victim, and unmasks the person who oppressed his heart, handing her back the very hell she created. This time, however, he usually does so definitively, because he has reason on his side, backed by facts.

All these emotional and mental hells are possible only because we make the mistake of taking manipulative women seriously instead of seeing them as mere mischievous children. One minute of distraction is enough for us to begin letting ourselves be carried away by the talk, being drawn into multiple negative states. If you take seriously the nonsense of this feminine world we are dealing with, discussing trivialities as if they were serious and very important matters, you will be lost. You will soon be dragged into states of confusion, anger, fury, sadness, doubt, etc.

5. The attraction to cruelty

Unfortunately, there are masochistic women who show that they appreciate men who make them feel fear, for they reason more or less as follows: "If I feel fear of this man, other people will too, and I will be safe. Besides, other women will desire him and will be envious of me."

These women feel safe in the company of cruel men. They go so far as to "domesticate" them through sex and affection until they become submissive to the point of being handled at will, at which point, paradoxically, they are assigned the function of emotional slaves who provide and protect. Cláudia Pacheco analyzes this point. If the attempt to "domesticate" them fails, the insistence goes on indefinitely under the disguise of love and is accompanied by lamentations. On the other hand, these masochistic women feel incomplete when their companions are kind. The testing of reproductive, protective, and providing capacities is continuous; it is repeated periodically for as long as the relationship lasts, never letting us rest in peace.

Each category of male fulfills a specific function in the lives of some women: the kind ones serve as emotional slaves to give love without receiving it in return; the hardworking and the rich serve to give them money and support them, receiving a cuckold's horns as payment; the wicked and cruel serve to protect them; the cads, perverts, depraved men, and womanizers serve to give them intense sex, fulfilling the unconscious fantasies of prostitution[11]. Note that this last male category corresponds precisely to those who do not fall in love and who receive from them the best they have: ardent sex without barriers.

Men of unimpeachable character and great principles, friends of morality and good manners, are sometimes intensely pursued by masochistic women and believe that they are sexually desired because they are “superior males.” In truth they are mistaken: what happens is that they are desired only because they behave like possible ideal husbands, provided they are dominated and emotionally enslaved.

It is a pity: the cruel and insensitive are seen as self-assured, while the kind are considered weak.

When we decide to be monogamous and faithful to one of these women, she does not believe that we are so by free, voluntary choice and by our own decision, but rather out of incompetence at seducing other, more interesting females, or out of shyness. Husbands of unimpeachable character suffer a demotion in the estimation of many women, even when those women are their own wives. These are women who usually believe that we are faithful out of incapacity, insecurity, fear, and inability to seduce, but not by our own decision. Loyal men are seen by this type of wife as shy and not as honorable or worthy (and such wives, obviously, flatly deny it while at the same time fantasizing about stupid romances with performers or famous or powerful men, who are inevitably promiscuous). To make matters worse, when we are content with their physical condition, accepting them as they are, not minding their extra pounds or other physical details, and not seeking a supplement outside the relationship, the dignity of this noble attitude is neither recognized nor returned in the same way; instead, wretchedly, they conclude more or less the following: "He accepts me as I am and demands nothing more because he does not value himself. Therefore, he is a second-rate man, since he does not desire women who are better, prettier, better groomed, and better mannered than I am." This fact demonstrates ingratitude. This problem is serious because we cannot fall into depravity, promiscuity, and degeneration to raise the opinion they have of us. Hence, the solution is to leave them in doubt by creating a silent mystery around the question of our fidelity.

Despite the prevailing hypocrisy that always leads them to claim the opposite, we are valued by the number of females we attract. This means that if this type of partner does not feel the weight of rivalry from other females, she will not respect us. This problem is all the more serious inasmuch as we neither want to nor can fall into promiscuity and depravity. The promiscuous are harming themselves, even though everyone considers them very manly. The solution is to maintain a mystery, speaking little and preserving the doubt.

Despite this fatal attraction some women feel for the perverse, we must never respond to this attraction by shouting, much less by assaulting them. The right thing is to reach them through psychological mechanisms, touching their feelings, as they do with us. For this, it is necessary to surpass them in every field of behavior, being stronger and not letting ourselves be dominated by their weaknesses. We must be at the same time more affectionate, colder, more indifferent, more protective, more careful, more dedicated, more romantic, more insensitive, more disconcerting, and more mysterious than they are with us.

Therefore, if we want to master the relationship, we have to be a synthesis of the various categories mentioned, fusing them in our personality, which is possible only when we dissolve the ego[12]. Above all, we must not fall in love.

Almost everything we normally try to do to seduce them has the opposite effect. The only ones who accept the pursuers who keep running after them, flattering them, sacrificing themselves, and chasing them with flowers, little notes, and other nonsense are the desperate ones: those who have no choice. The others prefer the mysterious and untamable.

The preference of certain women for the insensitive, the worst, and the cads is proof of the prevalence of male-chauvinist values in the unconscious. Provoking a male in order to take pleasure in seeing him enraged is a male-chauvinist attitude. Demanding to be treated rudely in order to fall into line and act honestly signals a male-chauvinist stance. Provoking the male to his limit, so that he takes extreme measures, is a sign of machismo. Enjoying the adrenaline of fear is an indicator of a male-chauvinist stance. Therefore, machismo is not exclusive to man and is rooted in the minds of masochistic women. Even among those who call themselves anti-chauvinist we find some who feel incomplete if they have a "wimp," a nice guy, by their side. Despite everything said to the contrary, the fact is that they want men who are really manly, truly masculine, and the undeniable existence of exceptions does not invalidate this hypothesis. And the reason for this is the instincts that guide them toward satisfying their needs to be protected and led.

Transform yourself. Do the opposite of what everyone does. Contradict her opinions, demolish her arguments without hesitation, but at the same time… confuse her by protecting and commanding. Do not offer passionate affection; offer firmness, security, and determination, which correspond to true love. Take sex as something owed to you, indisputably deserved.

6. The frustration of expectations

The selfishness of the sly ones leads them incessantly to promise and not to keep their promises, so that they may enjoy our frustration. They usually kindle our desires and then dodge satisfying them, in order to keep those desires alive. In this way, they obtain a highly precise measure of our dependence and of their own powers to seduce and attract.

We can dismantle this mechanism when we identify the behaviors that create the expectations that turn into frustration and get ahead of them by showing that we already know what they really conceal. Faced with behaviors that promise what we greatly desire, we must not appear enthusiastic but rather disappointed, because we know that they are deceptive, mere false promises.

Male frustration gives them great satisfaction because it reveals what we feel and provides proof that we value what they have to offer. We must not, therefore, depend on what these women offer in order to be happy. Happiness must be sought in ourselves, which is truly very difficult.

Remain constantly on the alert regarding everything they promise. There are two types of promises: explicit and implicit. Explicit promises are articulated verbally, and implicit ones are the worst, those that can be glimpsed in attitudes and behavior. Always expect the worst, remaining vigilant. Always start from the principle that behind seemingly promising, friendly, affectionate, kind, and seductive behavior there are intentions of frustrating you by deceiving you.

Do not allow your level of expectation to rise. Do not be fascinated by the wonderful opportunities you glimpse. Keep yourself at a zero level of expectation. Expect nothing and at the same time expect everything. Be realistic to the extreme. Do not allow illusions to carry you away from reality. See it as it is.

We can combat false promises at two moments or instances: at the moment they are developing and after they have already frustrated us.

If you are vigilant, you will be able to combat the wile by frustrating the sly woman before she frustrates you. The ideal moment for this is the one in which the promise is developing, being made. To frustrate her, it is enough to let her know that you will be watching to see whether she really does what she is saying. If the same frustrating promise is repeated, tell her the second time that you already know it is a lie. Show your low or nil expectation; make it visible. Get ahead of her by letting her know, at the good moments, that you already know what is coming.

When you are being treated well, courted, received in an inviting and friendly way, etc., prepare yourself for a surprise, for suddenly something unpleasant will come up. For example: it is common for dates to be set up with enthusiasm and, on the day, for the sly one to treat you coldly, fall silent, bring along a male friend, a girlfriend, or a child, fail to show up, etc.

If, however, your vigilance failed and you fell into one of these psychological traps, unmask her, establish a “punishment”[13] as the consequence for next time, and inform her of it without leaving room for discussion. By this means you will immobilize her and leave her in a dead end, making it impossible for her to frustrate you for as long as the possibility of the “punishment” being carried out lasts. Reason will remain on your side and can be used against the manipulative woman, who will have lost it the moment she feels unmasked. While the “little punishment” is pending, the little stunts will be suspended. If it is the first date and you are not yet intimate enough for this, when you smell the treacherous change in behavior, simply get ahead of her and become silent, looking her steadily in the eyes with calm and coldness the whole time, saying well-aimed things that disconcert her.

One “punishment” that usually works is to go mute, to fall silent and not talk at all, or as little as possible, in “retaliation” for some unpleasant event. It is a good “little punishment,” but it must always be used with fair judgment and in the right context for it to produce results. You must be fair, even if she has not been.

It is very dangerous to deal with such “little punishments.” Each undesirable behavior requires a specific reaction that must be correctly established, with impeccable and evident justice. The slightest injustice can be fatal to us because it puts them in the right and, therefore, gives them grounds to retaliate against us with confidence, since we will be in the wrong, and whoever is in the wrong can never complain. A small miscalculation or a simple lapse of attention is enough for the results to be the opposite of those desired. Obviously, one must be totally free of passion for such maneuvers. If we are in love, the plan will backfire.

Through psychological discipline, keep yourself ready to react correctly and justly. The moments when we are most exposed to being hoodwinked by manipulative women are those in which we are being treated well, in which there are no fights and the relationship is free of problems. We tend to lower our guard at such times, and they, instead of returning such a noble act of trust in the same way, as a virtuous woman would, seize the opportunity to strike us by surprise, which proves that they have a malignant, treacherous nature and are selfish.

7. How not to fall in love

Male passion can be defined as a hypnotic fascination with woman's voice, delicacy, beauty, perfume, touch, caresses, softness, whispers, and fragility. It is felt mainly in periods of abstinence.

Woman's fascinating characteristics attract us, hold us, intoxicate us, make us hallucinate, and drive us mad. They subdue us, degrading us to the level of a servile dog, without self-respect and without honor. Like a drug, they cloud our judgment, preventing us from thinking clearly.

In such a condition, we become exactly the opposite of the dominant male model that would intoxicate them with passion, and we always obtain results contrary to those we aim for. We become submissive, dependent on love being granted to us so that we can enjoy a few minutes of happiness. We see woman as a lifeline for our pains. Passion is a form of dementia.

To protect ourselves against this danger, or to rid ourselves of this emotional illness once it has set in, we need to employ will, spiritual discipline, and mental discipline correctly. It is no wonder that many spiritualist ascetics of various religions avoided women and sex. The hell of passion is truly unbearable, and few triumph over it.

The first thing to do is to learn to subdue the mind, avoiding mechanical imagination. All mental images, good or bad, related to the object of passion (the goddess of our dreams) must be suppressed by means of the will. Those that cannot be stopped need to be analyzed. It is necessary to reach mental silence. It is also necessary to work on the death of the psychic aggregates involved in amorous fascination.

The more feminine a woman is, the more fascinating and potentially dangerous she will be. From the beginning of the relationship, we must resist the fascination and combat the memories, fantasies, and thoughts related to this passionate love. It is the enchantment of Lilith-Nahemah[14] that leads the innocent astray and takes them to the abyss. Woe to the innocent, to the weak who let themselves be hypnotized by the charms of Circe, Delilah, or Helen of Troy[15]! They will plunge headfirst into the abyss, like the inverted pentagram. Woe to those who believe in earthly happiness and seek it outside themselves, in passionate love, because there they will find only suffering and madness.

By its own fatal, absurd logic, passionate female love[16] is condemned to eternal dissatisfaction, since its selection criterion is, inherently, male indifference and distance. This means that whenever we desire woman's love it will flee from us, and that it will come to meet us only when we do not want it, when we reject it[17]. There is no way to fool it by feigning indifference, because the unconscious expresses the real tenor of our feelings through subliminal channels.

Passion is a set of defects that we carry in the soul, in our psyche. To be overcome, it must first be understood through self-analysis.

[14] In certain branches of ancient Hebrew mythology, it was Lilith and Nahemah, and not Eve, who led Adam astray.

[15] Mythological representations of women who are at once fascinating, beautiful, and perverse.

[16] Note that here I am referring to passionate love and not to the conscious and sober love of women, nor to the insane, passionate, and fatal love of men.

[17] Something identical happens with woman: man's love comes only when she does not want it. This fatality prevents people from being happy in passionate love, since it drives them toward those who do not love them.

The analysis of passion is carried out by collecting as much information as possible about the feelings, thoughts, and actions involved in it. It is not theoretical but practical. To theorize about a psychological element is to move away from understanding it by inventing hypothetical ideas about its characteristics. The information is collected first of all through self-observation at the moments when passion manifests itself; that is, it is a self-study in loco. No theorizing should be allowed. All the details of the movements, thoughts, and feelings are important and need to be captured. In serious cases, the work can be supplemented with a self-analysis after the manifestation, but based exclusively on facts observed and remembered, without theorizing or hypothesizing. The information about passion is present at the moment of its manifestation and can be captured if we are vigilant.

Passion expresses itself in the mind in the form of multiple mental images: thoughts, recollections, memories, fantasies, and plans. At this level it is an automatic, mechanical, and autonomous imagination that does not obey our will. We can repel it, and it will come right back.

Besides the mind, the danger is present in the heart in the form of feelings, which are closely linked to the mental images that are in the head. It is felt as blows that actually hurt. The feelings that compose it are longing, jealousy, missing the person, the pleasure of being together, and a great many others that we could not list here for lack of space. At this level it becomes very subtle and disguises itself a great deal.

At the level of bodily movements, we can catch passionate weakness in the act when we turn our head or eyes to gaze at the beloved, when we stretch out our arm to make a phone call, when we walk toward her, and in countless other movements that vary from one case to another and from one person to another.

We can also observe and study passion in the form of instinctive and sexual manifestations. As instinct, that is, as everything related to the preservation of the species and of the person himself, we can see it quicken the heartbeat and the breathing rate, diminish hunger, etc.

The pain of passion is real, piercing, and deep. It is felt clearly in the heart and is objectively detectable. It causes visible and indisputable damage.

There are those who say that we should adore woman. This is something controversial. An authentic woman, who has struggled against herself, engendered her soul, and overcome her base instincts, is truly worthy of veneration; she should be cared for like a treasure, protected, and rewarded. On the other hand, a mere sly cheat does not deserve the same “adoration,” since she is no less wicked than anyone else, despite having a fragile and angelic appearance.

The more you think about the sly one (well or badly), the worse it will be. The ideal is simply to forget her, to give no importance to her whims, feelings, desires, thoughts, and absurd fantasies. Never take her seriously; remain distant and mysterious.

[18] The “poison” is drunk through credulity. When we set skepticism aside and surrender, from then on we will be intoxicated. It is much easier to prevent passion from setting in than to try to tear it out of the heart once it has set in.

If you “drink the poison” of passion[18], the spell will steer your thoughts by force, autonomously. You will try to think about other people but will not be able to. Your beloved will inhabit your dreams, your imagination, and your mind against your will. She will be an invader in your heart. You will try to turn your attention away from her, but whenever you do so you will fall again into the same abyss; you will once more be paying attention to the witch, occupying yourself and worrying about her; you will not be able to ignore her.

Nevertheless, she is not your enemy: your enemy is yourself. It is against yourself that you must fight: against your weaknesses, follies, affections, fears, desires, yearnings, dreams, fantasies, pains, attachments, etc. A man’s greatest enemy is himself. When we conquer ourselves, we conquer the sly women by extension, for ultimately it is not they who strike and wound us but rather our own feelings. Our partners merely use our weaknesses against us and, in doing so, are in truth showing us who we are and even, in a certain way, helping us. Therefore, do not revolt against anyone, much less against women, because it is a pure waste of time and nobody will pay any attention. Revolting against women is nonsense.

Be watchful of the habit of finding her similar to your mother. The tendency to see one’s partner as a mother is one of the roots of falling in love. It is the same feeling we had in childhood, and it makes us see women as lifelines.

The procedure for curing passion is the same one by which any other illness of the soul is cured: understanding.

8. Decisions that “corner”

To immobilize them and keep them from toying with our noble feelings, we need to find the right decisions. The right decisions are those that turn the tide in our favor, keeping reason on our side, and oblige them to act transparently, revealing what they truly feel.

We can say that the paramount strategy in such defensive emotional maneuvers consists in creating definitive, radical, and “cornering” objective conditions from which the sly woman cannot escape and which oblige her to reveal what she truly wants and feels toward us, since dissimulation, indefiniteness, and deception are her main psychological wiles. They try to hide what they truly feel, desire, and want in order to confuse us. They conceal their real intentions and simulate false intentions to disorient us. Decisions that “corner” must be understood and defined as follows: courageous and unappealable attitudes that leave woman no alternative other than to reveal unequivocally her true intentions toward us. They are attitudes that demand total detachment and freedom from passion, without which the plan will backfire violently and hit us. One must be truly willing to lose her forever for such radical strategies to work. Therefore, do not attempt such maneuvers if you are in love or attached, or if you are not willing to truly risk losing her. By means of “cornering” decisions, which I will describe shortly, you will find out what is really hidden behind the confusing and disconcerting behavior. Once you have discovered the truth, it will be much easier to decide what to do with your life and what course to give your relationship with your manipulative woman.

First of all, do not make empty threats, promising what you will not have the strength to carry out, for if you do, your credibility will be lost and your threats to leave her, to trade her in for another, never to seek them out again, etc., will become ridiculous[19]. They usually play to the very limit to find out whether we are bluffing.

Some "cornering" and "punitive" decisions such as the following can help:

• Absenting yourself long enough for her to suffer a good deal;

• Falling silent, reducing dialogue to zero or almost zero;

• Establishing consequences (ending the relationship, getting involved with another woman, definitively breaking off contact, terminating the commitment, etc.) for the next time the undesirable behavior is repeated.

"Cornering" and "punitive" decisions can be expressed in various ways, but they normally must contain an anticipatory component ("the next time you do such and such") and a consequence that hands back what was done, morally commensurate with and corresponding to the undesirable attitude that motivates it.

When your girlfriend or wife goes long periods without calling and invents lame excuses, go mute, fall silent, and do not talk until she insists on knowing what is going on. Then tell her that you will talk again only on the day she commits herself to calling with the frequency of a woman in love. Apply the same measure to long absences or to situations in which you are left confused, not knowing whom she is with or what she is doing.

If your companion likes to keep her cell phone turned off in order to torment you with doubt, let her know that you will accept her calls again only when she commits herself to leaving the device on permanently.

If your partner likes to refuse sex on absurd grounds or gives herself grudgingly, without enthusiasm, forbid her to seek you out again until she is mad with desire, letting her know that you will accept her again only when she commits herself to always having sex with great eagerness, in the way and with the frequency you need, without fussing.

If your companion insists on offering and not giving, on promising and not delivering, withdraw, letting her know that you will resume contact only on the day she corrects herself.

If your girlfriend treats men “with no ulterior intent” in a suspicious way that disturbs you, unmask her by bluntly pointing out the suspicious behavior that bothered you and let her know that the next time it happens you will trade her in for another immediately. The technique of withdrawing and demanding a correction of conduct before resuming contact also works in these cases.

If your girl insists on excusing shady attitudes and flatly refuses to acknowledge the malicious ulterior motives of the males around her, or stubbornly persists in being unnecessarily attentive, excessively nice, or friendly with “nice” guys[20], offering lame excuses, tell her to seek you out again only on the day she changes her mind and acknowledges her mistake.

Do not be afraid. If she truly loves you, she will end up agreeing. If she does not agree, it is because she never loved you anyway, and nothing has been lost. In any case, the truth will come to light and put an end to the doubts and indefiniteness.

Before your female suddenly disappears without a word, as the sly ones usually do to leave us desperate with love, let her know that, if she is absent for more than two or three days without giving explanations, you will simply conclude that she has decided to end the relationship. They like to do this so that we will be worried, imagining that something serious has happened to them, that perhaps someone has kidnapped them, or that they are simply at a motel with someone!

In short, if your partner behaves improperly, refuses sex, avoids your kisses and embraces, mistreats you, avoids you, provokes, challenges, irritates, frustrates you, does not call, is arrogant, etc., simply paralyze the relationship, distancing yourself suddenly and closing yourself off completely. Do not pursue her, do not seek her out for sex, do not talk, do not call, do not interrogate, do not try to force her to say what is going on, and, above all, keep your head, preserve your coolness, and do not fight, do not fight, do not fight! Break off contact and wait, wait, wait, and wait. Hold out to the end and do not give in (this is why we must never fall in love). There will come a moment when she will not be able to bear the emotional tension she herself created and will come to you to find out what is going on, because doubt and curiosity will be swallowing her alive. Then impose your conditions without softening them; make the necessary and correct demands for resuming the relationship: frequency and quality of sex[21], frequency of phone calls and of dates, the right way of being treated, exclusivity of attention, distancing herself from fake suitors, etc.

Formulate your demands in an absolutely clear way to avoid the customary feigned misunderstandings. Obviously, you must be polite, calm, and kind, but at the same time direct, decisive, realistic, and blunt.

Rigorously carry out all the aforementioned retaliatory promises. Do not threaten to do what you cannot carry out. However, do not try any of this if you are in love or attached, because you will be the one struck down.

The decisions must eliminate all possibilities of dissimulation and deception, leading to only one result: her revealing herself. For this, they must contain only two alternatives or ways out for the sly one: meeting your demand or ending the relationship. If she loves you, she will do what you demand (and demand something fair, for otherwise your girlfriend will feel wronged and will take revenge, with every reason; always keep reason on your side). If the girl prefers to end the relationship, it is because she never loved you and was no good for you anyway, so she will not be missed.

[21] If it is the case that she was already having sexual relations before. It would be dishonest to use this mechanism to force her to have sex with us if she had never had it before. I am referring to preserving and improving the frequency and quality of the sex one already has.

Once this wicked and cheating nature of many animal females is understood, as well as the impossibility of falling in love without suffering bad consequences, the following question inevitably arises in the male mind: Will we have to give up having a companion? How can we bring a woman into our home and live with her under the same roof?

To solve this problem, it seems to me that the most viable path is to maintain temporary relationships, without the eternal commitments on paper[22], extended for as long as the partner provides certainty of fidelity, honesty, and transparency[23]. When this certainty is irremediably shaken[24], it means that the moment has come to try a new venture. Suspicion of betrayal or adultery, even faint[25], when not dispelled, is enough to settle the total rupture of emotional commitments without appeal. It is not necessary to wait for certainty. A serious mistake I see in many suffering men consists precisely in waiting for certainty that they are being betrayed by their partners before breaking off the relationship or, at least, ending the commitments, instead of handing the consequences back to them at the first slight suspicion. Such weakness has its origin in being in love. If we are free of passion, we will not have to wait for the moment of catching them naked with their lovers; it will be enough to detect lies, incoherences, or simply something poorly explained for us to decree the end of the commitment. Let her know, without arguing,

[22] There are no women like the women of old anymore.

[23] In this way, the duration of the relationship will be in the partner's hands, and she will define it by her conduct. If she wants to keep her husband by her side forever, she will have to toe the line.

[24] Through proven lies and attempts at deception. E.g., telling her husband that she is going to a birthday party but not being there when he calls.

[25] I am referring to faint but serious suspicions based on unequivocal facts.

that at the first sign that something is wrong the consequences will be handed back.

There are big betrayals and small ones. The small ones are subtle and very frequent, usually disguised under some sentimental justification so that they seem innocent or sublime. Examples of subtle betrayals are: lying, continuing to listen to pointless courtship when there is no need to, being friendly or caring toward males who desire them, etc. The lame excuses are always the same: they claim that they feel sorry for the "poor guy," that he had no "bad intentions," or that they had not noticed his ulterior motives, etc. In truth, what they really want is to preserve the desires and hopes of the fake admirer, avoiding getting rid of him and pushing him away.

Obviously, the companion must be informed beforehand about the attitudes that shake trust and end the commitment, so that she cannot claim ignorance and accuse you of injustice. Draw up a list of the suspicious attitudes that bother you (obviously, do not be absurd; make a cold and rational judgment) and notify her decisively. If she has been warned beforehand and senses certainty in your voice and in your eyes, she will keep trying to seem faithful for longer and will prolong the relationship, perhaps indefinitely. But she must always be kept "on a tightrope." What is the purpose of all this? To try to revive the nearly extinct role of wife, practically nonexistent in our day.

Man's lesser emotional intelligence has made him less manipulative and more vulnerable to the effects of emotional attacks. Throughout history, man has never been capable of answering emotional aggressions with equally emotional responses. Stupidly, he has always answered them with physical reactions, which took all reason away from him and allowed countless accusations, besides feeding an unconscious ancestral hatred against his gender. Since they have never been struck back in their feelings for their little games, torments, manipulations, deceptions, etc., the sly ones believe themselves invulnerable in this field and rarely suffer the pains we suffer. We do not strike back in the same way but in different ways, and therein lies our mistake. Besides being proof of cowardice and weakness, the acts of assaulting them physically, insulting them, cursing them, shouting, etc., are a harmful waste of time that, in the long run, favors them by handing them the role of victim. Therefore, we have to learn to strike back at their feelings, so that they feel what it is like to have their noblest feelings turned into objects of irresponsible games. Toying with feelings and abusing another's sincerity is almost the same as toying with life[26]. Unfortunately, most men are too weak to hand back to them the appropriate emotional consequences. If such consequences always came, the use of wiles would certainly diminish.

Applying "cornering" decisions is much better than wasting time with discussions in the foolish attempt to force them to acknowledge their mistakes, which always has the opposite effect.

[26] Proof of this are the outbursts of furious madness of betrayed husbands and ex-husbands who take their families hostage and kill themselves. Male passion has this fatal side that can never be neglected. Warning people against it is doing good.

9. The importance of not polarizing ourselves

We can define skill in dealing with women as the art of correctly managing our good acts and our so-called "bad acts"[27] at the appropriate moments.

If we are exclusively good, we will be considered fools and will be deceived. If we are exclusively bad, in the broad sense of the word, we will be wrong, we will lose the right on our side, and we will give them grounds to take revenge with full justice. The ideal is for us to be simultaneously good and, in a certain sense, "bad," affectionate and somewhat "cruel," according to the situation, without ever polarizing ourselves on either side.

Always keep reason on your side and never be unjust. In this way, you will be able to unmask errors and dishonesty, destroying their defenses.

Act as if you were taming her[28]. Reward honesty, transparency, and loyalty with some affection, gifts, dedication, and protection. On the other hand, do not be afraid when you need to "punish"[29] dishonesty, suspicious, ambiguous, and confusing attitudes, and subtle betrayals.

[27] Only from a certain female perspective. It is in this sense that women consider those who do not let themselves be manipulated and who hand back to them the just consequences of their attitudes to be "wicked." Let it be understood that the words "bad" and "cruel" are used here as a figure of speech and not to designate acts harmful to others. The concepts of "good" and "bad" always give rise to confusion and controversy because good and evil are relative. What a sly shrew considers "wickedness" will be seen differently by a just woman. Thus, absenting oneself, not calling, falling silent, and unmasking lies are considered bad acts by many people, even if they themselves are arrogant, cold, distant, noncommittal, and indifferent in their relationship with us.

[28] Many books have been written teaching women to do this with men. On this, see Karen Salmansohn and Amy Sutherland.

[29] With the mirror-like acts of boycott that hand back the consequences, already referred to.

If there is true repentance for acts that are not serious, which tends to be rare owing to the falseness often found in the female sex, be understanding. Beware of crocodile tears.

Oscillate according to the situation, without clinging to the good side or to the “bad” side (as they consider it). Be neither exclusively good nor exclusively bad; disconcert her. Be just. Never punish her without her deserving it, because that legitimizes resentment. If you make a mistake, hasten to correct it.

Accustom her to your presence and not to your absence. If you withdraw too often, your companion will get used to your absence and your plan will go down the drain. On the other hand, if you are always present, you will not be valued. The ideal is to withdraw or break off contact only at the right moments, that is, when there is some attempt at deception. At such moments, however, the isolation must be prolonged and total. Do not lose the time accumulated while holding out: if you managed to go two days without calling her or seeking her out, you will lose that time if you weaken on the third day, and you will have to start the count over.

It is always necessary to compensate for hardness with protection and sincere affection. Continual coldness and distance cool the relationship.

Normally, the novice fixates on goodness or on wickedness and always obtains results opposite to those desired, and that is why this book is not intended only for the experienced. To master the relationship it is necessary to oscillate according to the needs imposed by their little games and to remain above their mediocrity and frivolity, a skill that demands the radical death of our defects and weaknesses.

10. Irritating provocations

Let us now study the hysterical provocations carried out by some shrews, which confuse us so much.

It is common for some men to be challenged, or for us to have our anger provoked, by the attitudes, behaviors, or words of their companions. These provocations are tests aimed at measuring a man's self-control, his degree of being in love, and his ability to react correctly to difficult situations.

When mixed with anger or wrath, the feeling of passion acts as a brake on the destructive aggressive attitudes of the male who is irritated at having suffered a provocation. Therefore, according to the degree of aggressiveness of your reaction, the woman will find out whether you are very much or only a little in love, and also whether you are impulsive or have self-control. If you lose your head and fly into a rage, you will be showing that you do not control yourself and, therefore, that you are an inferior-category male, incapable of keeping cool in tense situations to protect her in case of need. If you assault her verbally, you will be indicating that you are not very submissive but, at the same time, that you do not control yourself. In both cases, you will be lowered in the eyes of the sly one, who will feel superior to you. If you do nothing, on the other hand, you will be indicating that you are passive, submissive, and, likewise, not very interesting. What to do, then?

The situation is difficult, almost a dead end. It is yet another trap that tests and measures male worth. If we react aggressively to the provocation, we will lose the game. If we passively accept the provocation, we will also lose it. But there is a solution: calmly unmask the provocation at the exact moment it is happening, denouncing the fact before her eyes and to her face so as to make her feel found out and ashamed. Never walk into the trap. Do not assault, do not shout at, and do not curse your companion in any way, ever! Under no circumstances hurt her physically. These attitudes will make you lose the right on your side and come out defeated in the war of nerves being waged. She will look like a poor defenseless little thing and you will be seen as the villain of the story. That is exactly what the sly shrews want and try to induce.

When we denounce, without fighting or arguing, directly and clearly, exactly what is happening, what the provocative attitudes are, the reasons why they are challenging, etc., we immobilize our partner because we make her feel caught red-handed.

The act of challenging and provoking aims not only to test us but also to manipulate situations so as to put the person who provokes in the spotlight as a victim. Historically, females have always used this role as a social weapon for dominance and for obtaining protection and favors. In some cases of self-defense against perverse men, the use of this strategy is just, but not in all.

When we allow the woman to appear as a victim (without really being one) before ourselves, before women themselves, and before other people, we become morally indebted. Then we will feel an intense emotional need to flatter, please, run after her, etc., in order to be “forgiven.” The curious thing is that, when the manipulation is perfect, the one who seeks forgiveness is precisely the innocent one and the one who holds the power to forgive is the guilty one. It is an ingenious wile of mental manipulation that inverts each person's position and is typical of hysterical shrews[30].

The key to dealing with such hysterical stratagems is to catch the provocation in progress and denounce it immediately, without leaving any room for discussion and, of course, without fighting. Use a firm, convinced, and grave tone of voice, but speak little, in a short, blunt, and direct way, looking her in the eyes. Then fall silent or withdraw until she makes ashamed overtures toward reconciliation[31]. If she makes no overtures, leave her for good, trade her in for a better one, for you will have lost nothing: shrews who are not ashamed even when caught red-handed are incorrigible.

Do not be a chatterbox, long-winded. He who reduces his speech and dialogues to a minimum protects himself against female provocations. Speech gives away our feelings, limitations, and weaknesses.

The more you argue with your partner, the more complicated everything will become, because in such cases female arguments are capricious and illogical. Instead of seeking clarity and understanding when they argue, they seek to irritate us, calm us, appease us, and enrage us by turns.

A common form of provocation consists in stating or asking something obviously absurd but that has the power to touch exactly on [30] Put another way: man is manipulated by his feelings of guilt, as Esther Villar explained.

[31] The moment immediately following the reconciliation after a fight or breakup is very suitable for establishing a new pattern of relationship based on distance, coldness, dedication, protective leadership, intense eroticism, sincere affection, and impartiality, all consciously measured out and articulated.

our weak point, enraging us, while at the same time pretending not to realize what they are doing. Then, when they perceive our anger, they withdraw from the discussion on the grounds that we are being rude, as if our anger were unjustified. It is a very common procedure among the sly ones, whose intention is to leave us in a bad emotional state, but it becomes effective only because we argue and talk.

Since women are emotionally oriented beings, their attacks target the feelings of those they aim to wound, bend, and subdue. This happens because they have no other form of defense: attacks on feelings are a way of compensating for physical delicacy and little intellectual incisiveness[32]. Their ability to argue in a focused way is lesser, and that is why they attack us by the emotional route. Since we, human males, are puny and feeble in emotional intelligence and therefore childish in this respect, they have a field day. They attack in various and unpredictable ways, avoiding logical-rational confrontation as much as possible and trying to provoke specific feelings, because this is the field in which they dominate and feel at ease. Most men fall into the trap and, desperate, thrash about trying to force them to argue, sinking deeper and deeper and losing the war. And they lose it simply through a strategic error, as I will explain next.

One way of dealing with these disguised provocations is, first of all, to be distant and untouchable, never coming too close.

[32] I understand the female intellect to be very broad and comprehensive but not very incisive. It is easier for a woman to think about many things simultaneously than to think about only one thing with extreme depth. This gives women advantages in certain aspects of life and disadvantages in others.

For fulfilling our duties as men in what benefits them, we are always welcome, but for receiving from them the rights that would benefit us, we are always considered excessive, backward, male chauvinists, etc., and we receive, in return, provocations, complaints, deceptions, and lies. Hence, the solution is to discipline ourselves inwardly so as to achieve total silence.

Silence is armor, and if some witch is provoking you and driving you mad, this is simply due to some earlier opening that you left through speech. Do not let yourself be known, because he who lets himself be known becomes predictable.

Once we have shown ourselves and revealed who we are, we give them material to abuse our tolerance within our limits. Our limits are very carefully calculated through what we reveal when we speak, converse, act, etc. They detect them and rarely overstep them.

Whenever a man gives importance to what a sly woman says, he is usually dragged into various negative inner states and undesirable behaviors. This influence is hypnotic and takes place through fascination and identification. The ideal state is one in which we are indifferent because we insulate ourselves from the violent magnetic power of speech and voice (remember the song of the sirens[33]). Although they are physically delicate, many women possess an extremely strong hypnotic power that acts in various directions through the voice and the gaze, easily leading us now to joy, now to anger, now to despair. Hence the importance of not taking what they say seriously and of ignoring their words when they are deceitful. The simple act of paying attention to an attempt at deception may be enough to trigger a hypnotic crisis, and it is not wise to underestimate this power.

Therefore, a second precaution to take is not to let yourself be fascinated by provocations of good or bad feelings. This means: do not become enraged, do not be flattered, do not become enthusiastic, do not admire, do not hate, do not be made happy, etc. Resist attempts to induce liking as much as attempts to induce dislike. Do not let yourself be seduced by compliments, loving looks, displays of cleavage, love letters, gifts, etc. Equally resist the effect of cynical smiles, cutting remarks, attempts to belittle you, disparage you, make you jealous[34], etc. Do not waver; stay firm in yourself. Keep your mind silent and serene, looking her steadily in the eyes. Be calm. She will tirelessly try to provoke good and bad feelings by turns. The good feelings aim to disarm you, to make you lower your guard; the bad feelings aim to make you suffer and to retaliate against you for your rebelliousness.

Third, outdo her in the art of provoking varied feelings. It is of little use to be emotionally armored if, in addition, you do not attack correctly by the same route. Observe her and learn to strike at feelings as women do. Instead of uselessly trying to force her to argue, simply unmask each emotional provocation and hand everything back to her.

In short, the solution for dealing with irritating provocations is to be more resistant to provocations than they are and, at the same time, to be more provocative[35], defeating them in their own domain. He who surpasses them does not let himself be irritated but, on the contrary, is impervious to their multiple provocations. He does not let himself be manipulated because he resists good and bad temptations, the fascination of affection, flattery, challenge, insult, voluptuousness, sentimentality, attachment, arrogance, indifference, etc. The path is calm, non-action.

[34] By resisting bad provocations, we do not become violent. By resisting good provocations, we are not deceived. The ideal is always temperance: avoiding extremes. Let us not fall to one side or to the other.

As a complement, it is also advisable to "punish" irritating or dishonest attitudes with others of the same kind, within a rigorous criterion of justice, of course, so that the sly ones feel how delightful it is to suffer emotional abuse. If you turn each irritating attitude into a rule for the relationship, instead of taking revenge, you will have tied up the little smart aleck and will be left in peace for a while, for to strike at your feelings she will first have to strike at her own, and she will keep quiet. For example: if your girlfriend makes a date and fails to show up without reason, do not show up for the next dates you make and do not hide what you are doing. Let her know that, since she did not keep the appointment, you too have no obligation to show up, and that, the next time she breaks an appointment, there will be an even worse "punishment" ("if you did not want to come, why did you commit yourself?"); if you catch her in a lie, tell her never to tell the truth again from then on. Obviously, you can reverse this decision if there is sincere repentance, shown through attitudes. If the repentance is not feigned, it is fair to give another chance. We have to forgive if we want to be forgiven.

[35] Through a natural effect of mirror-like conduct.

One of the great difficulties in dealing with human beings lies in the fact that, normally, if we accept and forgive mistakes and dishonest attitudes for free, we are considered suckers instead of kind. He who forgives a mistake for free is considered an accomplice. Therefore, there is no other solution than to “punish.” The “punishment” I am referring to here differs completely from simple revenge because it preserves justice, honesty, sobriety, and reason, preventing worse things from happening. And it is nothing that will harm the other person; it will only hand her own acts back to her so that she may reflect.

11. Female vices and weaknesses

People usually speak of female wickedness reluctantly. The common tendency is to avoid it, to dodge the subject. On the other hand, denouncing the various and undeniable cruelties of men is commonplace, seen by people as natural since, as one often hears, "men are no good anyway." Good men, then, give a forced smile and pretend to find it funny, even though deep down they know things are not so simple. Hence the need for us to take the opposite path in order to clarify what is missing, facing head-on the problem that everyone avoids and denouncing it as fair-minded feminists[36] do with male vices. If it is true that animal humanoid males[37] are wicked toward females, coveting them, valuing them for their outward beauty, and always having sexual ulterior motives, it is no less true that females are wicked as well, valuing us for our social position, our attractiveness to beautiful women, our money, our fame, etc., and not loving us disinterestedly. They are wholly utilitarian and do not love us for what we are, but only for the practical and emotional benefits we can provide. Male ulterior motives are sexual: the male wants to copulate. Female ulterior motives are practical and calculating: to be envied by her rivals, to be turned into a princess, to have a slave, to draw attention, to be protected, to be known, etc. Therefore, men are not the only villains of the story.

[36] Let it be clear that I am referring to conscious and enlightened feminists and not to the misandrist Nazi-feminists who blame men alone for all the misfortunes of the world.

[37] We are all animal humanoid males. However, not everyone resigns himself to being one, and there are those who struggle to surpass themselves. We are not only human, as we like to think; we are also animals, and there is nothing wrong with that; it is merely the current stage of our evolution. Our animality, in turn, is not always in harmony with the instincts and with nature. It seems unnecessary to me to mention proofs that confirm this idea.

Vices are emotional weaknesses. Emotional weaknesses are the most intense desires of the soul, against which the person has no resistance. They are secret springs that lead to action. These springs are activated when the right psychological buttons are pressed. The right psychological buttons are pressed by means of attitudes that excite and kindle the passions, the desires, the fears, and the intense emotions. Hence the importance of human beings becoming conscious of their weaknesses and overcoming them.

Despite their sometimes apparent virtue and nobility of character, the sly women we are dealing with here have desires they are incapable of resisting. These are tools by means of which they can be taken, captured, and manipulated. I will point them out:

• being protected against her natural fears (fear of the dark, of loneliness, of abandonment, of death, of disease, of the cold, of the rain, of old age, of certain small and repugnant animals, etc.); this is the main weakness;

• a sweet tooth for candy, ice cream, and chocolate;

• being socially recognized, admired, and envied by all;

• getting ahead of her rivals, managing to be noticed by a famous man desired by many;

• discovering secrets that excite her curiosity;

• being desired and rejecting whoever desires her;

• dissembling, lying, and feeling that she manages to deceive possessive men;

• continually proving that she can make someone fall in love and suffer for love.

The desires mentioned are never fully satisfied during a relationship with more experienced men: they sabotage them. Women become attached to these men without understanding why. And the reasons come down to this: these men hold out the possibility of satisfying those absurd passions and at the same time never satisfy them fully, preserving the female thirst.

The desire to offer sex, affection, and love IS NOT one of the main female weaknesses. These three elements are merely tools used to attract men and dominate them in a manner analogous to the one described above. In the war of passion, the other's desire, whether man or woman, is never fully satisfied. He who completely satisfies the other's desire loses it. He who never satisfies any of the other's desires likewise loses it. He who most skillfully meets all of the partner's desires partially, always allowing those desires to continue, will win. That is why the war of passion is foolish; it has nothing to do with true love. The war of passion is pure sentimental selfishness.

Every desire is a weakness through which a person can be taken. Sly women do not wish to love a man unconditionally, disinterestedly, and altruistically, nor do they desire sex solely in and of itself, as the uninformed customarily think. Their desires are as petty and selfish as men's desires, differing from them only qualitatively. The kinds of desire differ, but the selfishness contained in them does not. That is why what is commonly called love has no use whatsoever. It is something dispensable and has nothing to do with true and divine LOVE.

Unless she has a history of dedication to the victorious struggle over herself and seeks to surpass herself day after day, becoming conscious of her weaknesses, a woman will betray her husband without much difficulty if left alone with another man who corresponds to the ideal male model in her soul. This is the proof that romantic and passionate love is a hoax to deceive innocent people. Passion has a fatal face that no one likes to talk about. The irresistible ideal male model is the one that synthesizes all the desires, dreams, fantasies, vices, fears, and longings that imprison the will. The men onto whom these models are projected will not necessarily deserve it. Fascinating men will not always draw a woman toward salvation.

If you are being ignored by some lady, that fact indicates, with total accuracy and without the slightest shadow of a doubt, that you are not pressing the right psychological buttons, whether out of ignorance or out of inability. But it is quite possible that a more experienced man is doing so. Most of the time, uninformed men press the wrong buttons; that is, they act mistakenly, believing they will get one result and getting another. Then they are surprised and become confused, without understanding the reason for the rejection or lack of interest. And the reason is simply ignorance: the attitudes he believes would impress them do not impress them, and the attitudes that would apparently drive them away do not drive them away. The effects are always the opposite of those expected, and the would-be seducer may fall into ridiculous situations without even realizing how ridiculous they are. Then we witness tragicomedies in which we laugh and cry at the same time. These are ridiculous attitudes that the uninformed believe have a seductive effect but that in fact produce the opposite effect: shouting, clowning around, talking loudly, using pickup lines, being extroverted, being a tough guy, being an exhibitionist, monkeying around, playing the nice guy, trying to please, pretending to be Prince Charming, acting in love, harassing, pursuing, keeping watch, appearing anxious and desperate for sex or for dates. Conversely, these are attitudes that produce a positive effect: taking no notice of beauty, looking fixedly into her eyes until they are lowered, surprising her by suddenly making contact, but as if no great importance were attached to it, being serious, speaking in a firm tone of voice, being short and blunt, speaking little, surprising her with long, well-judged speeches, ignoring her presence and then surprising her with sudden contact, disagreeing, contradicting her opinions, leading beneficially, advising severely, "horrifying" in a calculated way, "cornering," "pushing the evasive sly ones up against the wall," creating definitive situations, being distant, reserved, and mysterious, speaking little and correctly, being protective, touching physically in a quick, light way as if there were no intention, surprising her by speaking at length about well-judged things and then immediately returning to silence, not talking nonsense, not being long-winded, and, above all, being fair, sincere, and upright.

Before a man who leads, stands out from the rest, and impresses with his uncommon firmness and self-assurance, females swoon and cannot resist. It is a weakness analogous to the one we feel before beautiful, delicate, and voluptuous women who display their legs, their cleavage, and their curves, inviting us to love (even if they refuse it immediately afterward).

Much like children, many adult women need to feel the presence of someone more powerful and wiser who will guide and protect them (that is why the powerful are the most pursued). Outside this position, they feel vulnerable, exposed to the natural dangers of our species. It is this weakness that drives them to throw themselves madly at famous men, singers, and artists, because these communicate to the unconscious that they are more powerful than ordinary men ("If he stands out so much, he really must be very powerful and have something good about him!"). In such situations, the fantasies of the female unconscious are activated, which makes women come out of their immobility and offer themselves to, pursue, and chase the men who are in the spotlight. But once they have seduced and conquered them, they will suddenly be disappointed if these men do not live up to the demands of their unconscious fantasies. They will then lose interest and exchange them for others, or keep them as mere trophies, emotional slaves, or something of the sort.

Indifference to sex and reluctance to show acts of love and affection compensate for physical frailty and confer emotional dominance over the other gender; these are factors that make women emotionally resilient and hard to defeat in the wars of passion. The females of mammals and birds, in general, are not eager to copulate, unlike the males, who fall into intense stress when forced into abstinence, even developing pathologies. The desperate need for the sex-affection-love triad felt by human males makes them vulnerable and forces them to pursue, please, chase, flatter, and submit like subjects to a queen. Like princesses and felines, human females receive security and comfort as something naturally due to them, whose corresponding price need not be paid, since their mere existence is already seen as a more than fair payment. We males, on the contrary, generally resemble slaves and dogs, for we consider it natural to sacrifice ourselves, giving them much or everything and receiving little in return. Therefore, they are strong in a field in which we are weak. To make matters worse, knowing that they are delicious and necessary for our emotional health, they take advantage of this weakness to exercise dominance. Man, as a rule, is a puppet who manages everything and commands everything, except the felines who command him. Male superiority is a myth.

Some uninformed men project their psychological characteristics onto women and believe that women are like them, eager for sex, love, and affection. They believe that the love-sex-affection they offer could impress women, who would then fall in love with their phallus erectus. This is an absurd idea that does not hold up under observation and experience, because women function in the opposite way to men; they are men's opposite pole.

Knowing our weaknesses as they do, it becomes easy, for example, to tame through affection a husband enraged by jealousy, or to invite harassment by exposing themselves and then accuse the harasser, etc., for everything stems from men's weakness (and men, therefore, are also to blame for it). Therefore, we have to fight our own weaknesses instead of setting ourselves against our delicious felines. When we subdue our animal part, our needs, our desires, our craziness for sex, etc., we involuntarily subdue them by extension, even if we do not want to, because we eliminate the buttons or weak points through which we were manipulated. In other words, we subdue them when we subdue ourselves, giving up subjecting them to our interests and to our passionate weaknesses, namely: desire, affections, lust[38].

The behavior of the sly ones is often governed by a principle I call "sentimental selfishness." For them, what matters is not our feelings but theirs, and theirs alone. They are absolutely blind to anything else. They consider "logical" whatever provides desirable feelings and "illogical" whatever provides undesirable feelings. Here another complication arises and the pot boils over for good: pleasant feelings are not always the desirable ones, because the unconscious reacts differently from, and even contrary to, consciousness.

Sentimental selfishness possesses them and drives them to constantly satisfy the need to confirm that we are suffering from love. When they cannot detect signs of emotional suffering in their partners, they become sad and say to themselves: "He doesn't suffer for me anymore; I must be getting uninteresting and unattractive, etc." They take pleasure in seeing us suffer from anger, irritation, jealousy, longing, sadness, absence, attachment, confusion, doubt, etc. It is this very need that strikes back at them when they come up against a refractory man, for he does not allow it to be satisfied. Since the desire to confirm our emotional suffering is very strong, it turns into an internal parasite that swallows them alive when it is not satisfied, for the pain of dissatisfaction is proportional to the intensity of the desire[39].

Therefore, the refractory partner will strike at the sly one's feelings a first time by refusing to suffer from passion, and a second time by "punishing" her with her own attitudes and unsatisfied desires. If even so she does not change, he will have no alternative but to leave her.

There are extreme cases of violent predatory females, highly hysterical and aggressive, who dare us to assault them physically ("Hit me, if you're a man!"). In such cases there is no alternative but to walk away forever.

Very few males manage to deal with this female vice of provocation. Most despair and succumb, for the learning is difficult, slow, and painful. The weak shout, assault, insult, and lose the war.

Men may be strong physically and intellectually, but emotionally they are feeble. They easily lose their temper when provoked. They are impatient and have a short fuse. This emotional feebleness causes defeats in the wars of passion. Women's greater emotional intelligence confronts and disrupts men's physical and intellectual strength and defeats it, taking men apart and knocking them down. This is the reason why those who resist influences and provocations on the emotional level become invulnerable.

The minds of the sly ones have difficulty distinguishing kindness from weakness, just as they do cruelty from strength. This confusion leads them not to feel safe in the company of democratic and kind men. However, there are good and strong men, just as there are cruel and feeble men. Therefore, the preference for the worst is based on a mistake. And this mistake results from yet another vice: superficiality in judgments.

[39] It is for this reason that women should recognize and transcend their weaknesses instead of hurling invective at whoever describes them.

12. The ideal male profile

If your relationship is worn out, your partner ignores you, refuses sex, does not want to see you, etc., this means that your person, as it has always been, no longer interests her. Therefore, it is time to “die” and become someone else. Understand this well: “dying,” here, means becoming another person completely different from who you have always been, changing yourself to the point of causing strangeness, a sense of loss. It is a symbolic “death”: the real death of your egos, that is, of the psychological person you are.

If you are in a panic, desperate, or depressed because your beloved has betrayed you or despises you, and you are thinking of suicide, I suggest you do not do it. Choose to “die” psychologically rather than make an attempt on your own life or against your own physical body. It is better to transform yourself psychologically than to commit suicide, don’t you think?

If you truly “die” within yourself, you will become another person in fact, and not by mere supposition or simulation. You will not simply be simulating a behavior but will have truly transformed yourself. You will no longer be recognized; the woman who made you suffer will find you strange and will despair because she has lost you.

If you are being despised, this indicates that you may be making the following mistakes:

• Being excessively affectionate;

• Talking too much;

• Trying to please her all the time;

• Showing fear of losing her;

• Demanding attention, affection, and sex;

• Demanding her presence and company;

• Running after her all the time, calling nonstop, etc.

Despite the lies the sly ones tell, the fact is that a very affectionate man becomes tiresome and serves only to be rejected and treated like a slave or a mongrel dog. Affection must be well dosed, rationed. Be affectionate only now and then and at the right moments: as a reward for good conduct. Be more cold than affectionate, but not totally cold.

Generally, a man strives and sacrifices himself intensely, flattering and pleasing, in order to receive in return a minimal amount of affection and sex. This tendency is general and you will be able to confirm it through observation. Women are so used to this that whenever you show yourself affectionate you will be seen as a harasser in search of the sex-affection-love triad. Since they are not very fond of sex, the result is that affectionate men are considered uninteresting and are used as mere emotional slaves who give everything of themselves and receive little or nothing in return. The curious thing is that it is precisely the insensitive ones, who are very few, who receive for free and without effort what the affectionate men and the harassers struggle so hard to obtain. This happens because women do not understand the logic of love in depth. In the field of love relationships, the minds of the sly ones work like the minds of swindlers: they are incapable of understanding events from any point of view other than their own. The only point of reference in love that exists is themselves, for they live immersed in a natural selfishness. It is a waste of time, therefore, to pressure and demand affection, love, and sex from those who refuse them, because such an act will always produce the diametrically opposite effect.

Do not be a chatterbox and do not talk too much. If you observe, you will see that these women's conversations are usually superficial and subjective. If you enter into this frivolous subjectivity, taking part in useless conversations, listening to litanies, psychological songs, gossip, soap opera endings, malicious talk about other people's lives, etc., their unconscious will react by considering you not very masculine, since among the ideal male characteristics are rational objectivity, firmness, depth, superiority, and dominance (that is why they pursue leaders). The disastrous result will be the following: your partner will consider you "nice," "kind," and "pleasant," but very unattractive as a male. Likewise, you will fall into an equally ridiculous situation if you keep trying to be funny, to make her laugh, to make funny faces, to hang upside down from branches, etc., for you will be treated as a cheerful and well-meaning clown. Also, do not get into arguments; resist the fatal magnetism of the viperish tongue and ignore useless complaints. Do not keep shouting, because you will be considered not very masculine. We want them to see us as males, and not as friends, pets, or clowns, right? Therefore, the ideal is to be silent, serious, stern, and to talk little. However, these few words must be well judged, always in a tone of command and in a protective and guiding manner, directed toward good and never toward evil. Never legitimize the accusation that men are oppressors and enemies of women.

Do not run after her fantasies, trying to satisfy them, because you will be considered a mere submissive slave. We may even do this now and then, but not always, because it communicates submission.

This is the hardest part: do not be afraid of losing her. If you have this fear, it will show through your attitudes or during the relentless tests to discover who we are. Be continually willing to lose her for real, forever. If you feel afraid of losing her, you will be showing that you do not have other, better, more faithful, more dedicated, more sincere, and more beautiful women at your disposal and that, therefore, you are a second-class male, hardly capable of getting females. You will also communicate that you want to pressure her, smothering her with your feelings and attachments. Women greatly value detachment and indifference when combined with a protective-guiding posture that is beneficial to them. Detachment, sentimental coldness, and insensitivity are considered ideal male characteristics. Let it be understood that such attributes are not intrinsically bad, for they may very well be used to fight wrong things, to protect, and to avoid dangers. Coldness is bad when it is turned toward selfishness, but not when it translates into calm directed altruistically. That is why women value attributes like these.

Harassing them and pursuing them is also a serious mistake. The harasser is always rejected because he communicates that he is incapable of obtaining something more important in life. Harassment communicates weakness, submission, desperation, urgency, etc. Therefore, do not keep phoning nonstop, pursuing her all the time, etc. Let her do this with you, and if she does not... too bad! Do not seek her out; let her seek you out as often as she likes. That way you will know who she really is and what she truly feels.

When she wants to see you, do not resist; but when she suddenly disappears, simply forget her, ignore her, and busy yourself with other things, disappearing for even longer, normally for twice as long.

Women are used to being flattered all the time in exchange for sex, affection, and love. They have adapted so thoroughly to flattery, gifts, compliments, special treatment, privileges, etc., that they get a shock when a man ignores them. They feel diminished, small; they believe they are losing the competition with their rivals, and their self-esteem drops terribly. As a result, they often pursue him out of revenge, in an attempt to reject him as soon as they can bend him.

Do not fall into the trap of the good, democratic, and pliable boyfriend. Be democratic if she deserves it, but be firm in your points of view and change them only if the errors are objectively demonstrated. If she resists, demolish all her arguments, run over them and crush them (note well: the arguments, is that clear?) without pity and without hesitation. The act of giving in is seen as a sign of weakness of spirit, because it indicates little firmness of purpose and little willpower. Pliability is never recognized and repaid but, on the contrary, is exploited as a chance to abuse the other. The pliable man is considered a sucker and not a wonderful man. They seek males who will guide, dominate, and protect them, and not servants who will satisfy their capricious whims.

The ideal man, modeled according to our objectives, speaks little and to the point (this is just a model for reference). He uses a deep and imperative tone of voice. He speaks in a tone of command. He does not ask his partner for permission: he orders, but does not force her to obey, leaving her the right to refuse. He does not talk about himself. He does not complain. He does not confess his weaknesses. He does not cry in his partner's presence. He is not a chatterbox. He looks into her eyes suddenly, fixedly and firmly. He does not watch her all the time, only now and then. He does not hover over her: he almost ignores her existence. He does not argue. He does not debate: he simply informs. He is a king in his domain and not a servant. He does not miss her, does not pine for her. He does not harass. He does not keep looking at other women's bodies, because he is neither lustful nor a fornicator. Despite this, when the female finally seeks him out for sex, he shows his strength in wild, overwhelming sex like a hurricane. He is an earthquake in bed. He does not use pickup lines: he pleases without effort. He does not shout. He does not let dirty games go unnoticed: he knows how to hand them back. He is not a clown. He is not funny. He does not laugh often: he only smiles slightly now and then. When he finally laughs, his laughter seems to have something strange about it. He takes the lead in situations. He dominates the relationship for good and not for evil, treating the woman like a little girl. He does not pester his partner by asking her opinion all the time. He is not irritated by provocations: he knows how to hand the consequences back to whoever launched them. He is impenetrable, distant, and mysterious. He neither forbids nor takes revenge: he hands back the consequences, rewarding the sincere women and making the insincere ones who try to deceive him bear the burden of their own acts. He does not chase after lies, for it does not matter to him whether he is being deceived or not. He does not commit himself for free: he charges a high price. He is a prize. He values himself. He is not affectedly sensitive. He is not delicate. He may have a lot of money, but he despises it. He is above social prejudices. He is neither a moralist nor a “goody-goody” fellow, a friend of good manners. When he enters a room, he attracts women’s attention because he ignores them. He does not beg to be loved. He does not need passionate affection to be happy: he despises it, knowing it to be false and hypocritical; he prefers true love. He helps. He advises. He cares. He protects. He guides. He commits no injustices against his partner. He always keeps reason on his side. He uses hardness and firmness for good and not for evil. He is disconcerting. He surprises. He is not predictable. He is not moved by onion tears, he ignores crocodile tears, he is moved only by real tears, which he knows very well how to identify. He does not chase after capricious complaints. He fuses opposite characteristics. He is at the same time good and, in a certain sense, “bad,” indifferent and protective. He punishes adultery with a definitive, unappealable break, or with contempt. He never commits a crime of passion. If he is betrayed or deceived, his mere absence and contempt will be enough to punish the traitress, who will suffer because she cannot find another like him to replace him. He is the best of all because he does what none of the others do: he treats her like a little girl, making her feel like a child, small, reminding her of her childhood, instead of deifying her and placing offerings on her altar. His heart is worth gold; he charges a high price to commit himself: total, complete, and transparent fidelity. He is an incomprehensible mystery. In short: he is a real Man.

Of course, no mortal man would fit this model with mathematical exactness and in its entirety. But the model serves as a reference for us to approach it.

When a man is not being noticed, he usually monkeys around, harasses, uses pickup lines and compliments, looks with a covetous and hungry gaze, etc.; this indicates that he is ignorant of this science and that he is not behaving as he should. If he changed the way he treats her, replacing harassment with the right attitudes, attraction would be activated. The need to harass shows ignorance of the behaviors that generate attraction. He who acts correctly has no need to harass. The only women who accept hungry, desperate, and anxious harassers who throw out lame pickup lines with famished looks are the desperate ones: those who have children going hungry and urgently need a provider, the old maids who have not yet lost hope, the unbearable bores, etc. If, despite everything, an interesting woman accepts such repulsive behavior, she will do so for some other reason, such as money or status, but never because she has felt attracted.

The fact that we are not harassers does not mean that we should remain passive, standing still and waiting for some woman to fall from the sky. You can, and indeed should, take the initiative, acting as a male who makes an impact, strikes psychically, astonishes, and even shocks positively (positively, let that be clear!), but never as a feeble, desperate harasser.

The act of “horrifying” positively, already explained in the first volume, consists of breaking established ideas, behaving in a way absolutely opposite to the usual one but well calculated, that is, with behavior that shows one is different from the feeble. It demands great skill, for the slightest mistake can produce the opposite of the desired effect. “Horrification” must be positive and not negative (keep that well in mind!). An example of positive “horrification”: giving an order in a serious tone that runs counter to what a beautiful sly one is doing but that, ultimately, benefits and protects her. This attitude runs contrary to the tendency of all the feeble, who hasten to please her and submit instead of treating her “with the sword”[40], as Ulysses did with Circe. Those who are incapable of contradicting her are enslaved by animal passion and turn into swine like Ulysses’ companions. The superior male not only commands her but contradicts her and could not care less whether she will like it or not. He does not worry about recriminations, disappointments, etc., because he does not want to impress; yet precisely by renouncing the wish to impress, he impresses her.

When people speak of the ideal male profile, the one we are trying to model, a dangerous mistake usually occurs. I will denounce it: there are two ideal male profiles. One of these profiles is ideal for achieving selfish female objectives, and the other is ideal for achieving male objectives. Normally, the ideal male profile described and portrayed in movies, magazines, soap operas, interviews, etc. is false, because it corresponds only to selfish female objectives: it would be the sensitive, cuddly guy who sends flowers, hardworking, honest, affectionate, and with money, always at her disposal. Since this objective is entirely calculating and selfish in its ends and its means, it turns out to be contrary to our objectives and becomes devastating for our lives when we adopt it. Almost all women unanimously claim that such men are ideal and that they would like to have them by their side, but they do not say what they are ideal for, nor what they want them for. I will tell you: they are ideal for being emotional slaves, giving love and receiving coldness, cuckold's horns, disdain, abuse, etc. in return.

The ideal male profile I have described here and tried to model is by no means this soap-opera profile that they describe. It is an ideal profile for protecting oneself against domination in love, manipulation, deception, lies, dissimulation, disrespect, and being cuckolded. Although it seems contradictory, it is a profile that also benefits women, even though they protest against it when they are thoughtless.

It is essential to resist the influences of fascination in all their forms. Fascination is hypnotic, and we can define it as an identification of our person with external facts. Contrary to common sense, fascination operates not only when there is liking and dazzlement but also in negative situations of conflict. Hostile words, offenses, insults, provocations, scorn, etc. provoke as much fascination as compliments, affection, promises, etc. Fascination by negative attitudes provokes negative emotional states. If you are mad with rage because you were double-crossed, overjoyed because you got what you wanted, sad because you were abandoned, etc., you are fascinated by these events. We must not, therefore, be fascinated either by good or by evil.

You will not be able to simulate this ideal male profile I have modeled here. If you merely try to pretend to be like this without really being so, your plan will backfire: you will develop emotional illnesses and will be unmasked in the selective mating tests directed by their animal instinct (we all have animal instincts; no one should be offended by this), falling into ridiculous situations. The female instinct possesses an ancestral wisdom, developed since prehistoric times, and quickly allows them to identify a fraud who wants to mate. Be a real Man, with a capital M. But for that you will have to die within yourself and become someone else. It is a hard, arduous task. Many fail in this attempt.

Men today seem to be ashamed of being what they are. The fashion is to be affectedly sensitive, and anyone who raises the banner of masculinity and heterosexuality is considered prehistoric, a troglodyte, backward, and a male chauvinist. The male is cornered. It is commonly said that we are good for nothing. However, all women remember us in times of danger and of difficult tasks. No one dares to say we are useless when floods, earthquakes, and fires occur. And if it were not for us, the males, our species would not have survived natural dangers and wild beasts since prehistoric times. Who was it that hunted mammoths and faced saber-toothed tigers so that women would have protein to eat? Who was it that waded into rivers infested with crocodiles, piranhas, and snakes to bring them fish? Therefore, it is not indispensable to have a uterus and shelter life in the womb in order for someone to be indispensable. Of course, without women we do not exist, and their importance has never been denied by real men. No man would idealize a world without women. In the same way, the intrinsically masculine characteristics I described above are, and always have been, indispensable to women, regardless of what they say. It was these characteristics that allowed men to wage wars and hunt wild beasts to defend them.

13. A violent war of nerves

You are alone, or with someone whose company is pleasant but does not fulfill you as you would need. Meanwhile, your beloved is perfectly happy with other people.

You miss her, but she does not miss you. It is always you who takes the initiative to seek her out, and the opposite never happens. You always take the initiative in calling: you call several times until she finally answers. You drag out the phone conversations until she begins to make lame excuses to end the conversation. She always hangs up first.

You are always curious about what she has to tell. She is never interested in what you have to say.

You give countless assurances that you are faithful and that you love her, but you receive as payment only doubts, inconsistent facts, and fishy stories.

She promises to see you; you wait anxiously for a long time for the date, but she lets you down. The excuse she offers would not convince even an idiot.

In desperation, you stay away, but your absence is not felt in the least. On the contrary, it seems that your absence pleases her even more. Then you discover that you need her very much, but she does not need you in the least. For you there is nothing on Earth more important than she is, but for her there are many things more interesting than you. You are traded for girlfriends, “male friends,” relatives, parties, trips, bars, or even a simple television program.

You are an open book: she always knows where you are and with whom. On the other hand, you never quite know whom she is with and what she is up to.

You feel you are in hell and she feels she is in heaven; that is why she is a goddess and you are one of the damned. She is your goddess because you put her on the altar.

When she finally shows interest, there you are, available, as if you had waited for that moment for all eternity. She momentarily graces you with a little of her wonderful presence but soon withdraws, so that you tumble out of the dream again and fall into the nightmare.

Welcome to Hell! The merciless war of passion is under way and you are being defeated day after day. You may die of sadness, somatizing illnesses, or go mad. You may commit a crime. Your mental torture makes her immensely happy, for she feeds on your misfortune. When she is far away, in the painful absence, she knows you are suffering. She feels she is the best, the hottest, the most beautiful (even if she is not), a super-female, because she has the power to reject and trample.

You try to defend yourself but discover that you are incapable; you have no strength. The only strengths you have are brute muscular physical strength and reason, which are useless in this war. Muscles are of no use, and reasoning is of even less use.

The more you argue, the worse things get and the more the problems become tangled and aggravated. You try to make her understand your obvious point of view, but she pretends not to understand and turns the conversation into chaos. You complain and receive in reply: “You’re insecure,” “You don’t trust me,” etc. It is no use appealing to logic, for everything is crazy, insane, illogical, absurd, calculatedly stupid, and irrational.

If you lose your head and hit her after so many provocations, you will have fallen into a trap: you will undeniably reveal yourself to be a cowardly villain by assaulting a “frail being who only knows how to give love.” You are tied up and dominated.

You know that disappearing is not the solution, for she will not come after you and you will lose her forever. She knows that, even after several years without seeing you, you will be there, available. You are worth nothing because you have nothing interesting, and therefore your absence will not be felt. But you do not want to lose her. The thing is, you have nothing that she really wants or needs, while she has many attributes without which you could not live: her particular way of being, her gaze, her walk, her voice, her touch, etc.

You were cheated, you fell into an emotional trap, you were double-crossed. It was all a lie: the loving gaze, the guileless smile, the delicacy, the purity of feelings, the frailty, the defenseless look, the affection, the words of love. She deceived you, toyed and gambled with your happiness, with your sincerity, and with your noblest feelings. Your mistake was falling in love, considering her unique, special.

Now the only solution for you is to give up everything and fall apart. So fall apart and “die” psychologically, eliminating from yourself this poisonous feeling that has thrown you into such a miserable state.

Do this and you will see that little by little everything will change. You will understand that your goddess was made of clay and that her divinity was a sham. You will hurl the disenchanted statue far away.

I tell you that you have been deceived all this time. You were fooled by passion and are seeing the world upside down, inside out. There are many important and interesting virtues within your person, but you ignore them; you do not know them. Dig them up. There is another man in there; wake him up. Stop loving passionately. Stop longing for her. Stop flattering. Stop pursuing. Do not spend your precious time thinking about her; unmask her without pity. Treat her as she really is: a female. Ignore her crocodile tears. Denounce the lies and unmask the pretenses at the very moment they are under way. Ignore her onion crying. Make her see who she really is: a sly one with an angel's face. Do not let her run away from herself. Give her a good lesson in feelings so that she never forgets it and never again toys with anyone else's happiness.

Yes, she needs you, but neither of you knows it. What attributes do you have without which she could not live? Many. What does she need madly? Your guidance, your protection, your command, your initiative, your logical rigor, your lack of inhibition, your self-assurance, your determination, your certainty, your coldness, your firmness, among others.

She wants you to be greater, to dominate the situation so as to lead her safely; that is why she resists. She wants to have reasons to respect you and to feel protected at the same time; that is why she provokes, attacks, and challenges. She wants to gauge your capacity not to be deceived; that is why she lies, plays dirty, and tries to cheat you. She wants to gauge your capacity not to be persuaded; that is why she offers false affection. She creates psychological hells and takes pleasure in watching you dance in the fire. It is the most brutal animal instinct in action: the instinct of the female's selection of the male. If you fail, you will be discarded from the genetic history of your species, and it will be no use explaining your reasons to her, because they will not move her. She will take no pity, for you are a man and were therefore born to be tough and to suffer, to "put up with everything," and if you are weak, you are good for nothing. She, and not you, is the male chauvinist.

Many women cannot feel attraction and pity for the same man. But, unfortunately, some can feel attraction and fear simultaneously. Others can also feel attraction and sadness. These women do not love those who wish to make them happy, but those who make them cry, making them unhappy. Such is nature. And unless they struggle hard against themselves and against their instincts, so it will continue to be, unfortunately.

14. Getting them to reveal themselves

Let us return once more to the thorny point related to the true and hidden nature of woman. There is much that is wonderful and sublime in this nature, but there is also much perfidy, which is expressed in varying degrees according to the personality. While in some women this perfidy is hardly noticeable, in the sly ones we are concerned with in this book it is quite evident.

The general tendency is for them to dissemble, feigning shyness, modesty, innocence, inexperience, decency, purity, and naivety in the sexual field. Behind the mask, however, there may hide a sensual female imprisoned by fear of male authoritarianism, jealousy, and possessiveness, which aim to preserve exclusivity. This hidden sensual female may express herself clandestinely to a greater or lesser degree, according to the courage the woman has to break the imposed norms that create in her the need to keep up an appearance of saintliness and chastity. This hidden side, in some cases, is so repressed and extinguished that it can be detected only in dreams. In any case, there will always be repressed aspects of the personality in the realm of sensuality.

It is extremely difficult to make this hidden part show itself if you are her husband or boyfriend, because of the ancestral and justified fear of male reactions. Since the general rule is that males are territorial and possessive, demanding exclusivity[41], women pretend to be that way to [41] Man errs when he demands exclusivity. Exclusivity must not be demanded; it must be received. Man's territorial instincts, which make him possessive, are one of the reasons that force women to dissemble their conduct. Therefore, he who overcomes them receives exclusivity in sex and frees the woman from the need to dissemble.

please us. The result is that we date, commit ourselves to, and marry a mask, a person who does not exist, through our own fault.

This is the reason why husbands rarely know their wives truly and, obviously, suffer from it their whole lives. There always seems to be a mystery, a question mark in their heads: "How would this woman react if she were left alone with another man? What is the limit of her fidelity? To what extent am I the exclusive holder of her desires and her sexuality?"

Unlike husbands, who tend to be rigid and moralistic with their wives, libertines and immoral men know and enjoy precisely the female side that is hidden at home and lived in limbo, in the half-light, and clandestinely. This happens because women believe that their forbidden acts will not be condemned by the libertine but, on the contrary, approved, encouraged, and directed by those who place themselves diametrically opposite to the marital role. It follows, therefore, that only if we are immoral and encourage socially forbidden female behaviors will we know who the woman really is.

At the slightest sign of conservatism or prohibitionism on our part, the woman will withdraw and begin to simulate politically correct and socially praiseworthy behavior because we demand it. We see, then, that the best way to get to know them is by showing that we are precisely the opposite.

If you acquire within yourself the capacity for total acceptance, revealing yourself to be a completely liberal man, one of those who like their women to travel alone, to have male friends "with no ill intent," to visit women's clubs, bars, etc., and if you manage to make her really perceive this, you will find out who your partner truly is and what can be expected of her. But you must demonstrate it perfectly, or you will be deceived. For that, it is necessary not to be in love.

As Eliane Calligaris correctly showed, women have a strong need to live the side of life that has been forbidden to them. This is one of the reasons why immoral men, libertines, cads, playboys, Don Juans, etc. attract them so much. They are the living possibility of experiencing what their fathers and husbands deny them.

Your partner will never reveal herself if she perceives that you are a moralist. However, we men are, by instinct, territorial. We obviously want our female for ourselves alone, and that is a legitimate right. But it is not right to force or to forbid anyone from doing what they want, because each person must have the right to run his or her own life. If, even believing that we are absolutely amoral, our partner still remains firm in her exclusive dedication, rejecting “modern” behaviors, this will indicate that she possibly has a vocation for being a good wife, for she has offered us her fidelity without our demanding it, without our pressuring her.

Almost every heterosexual man is, deep down, a moralist. Even the most immoral libertines usually prefer as wives women who keep other males well away. The thing is, libertines pretend, passing themselves off as very understanding and tolerant. In truth, human males are exclusivist by nature. They always tend to forbid, which gives females very fair reasons to deceive them and get around their ridiculous prohibitions, mocking them inwardly. The solution is not to be prohibitionists but to accept whatever comes, so as to discover who the person by our side truly is. Once the reality has been discovered, we can make whatever decision seems most correct to us.

When they lie, sly women do so by asserting the opposite of what we know. For example, if the husband looks for his wife at location A at a time when, by habit, she should be there, and later tells her so, she will possibly defend herself with the following lie: "No, my routine changed today and I stayed at location B." Therefore, to induce her into a blatant lie that cannot be disguised, that cannot be denied, and from which there is no escape, it is enough for the husband, instead of telling her the truth that he was at location A (a true fact), to hide this information and convey convincingly in their conversation the idea that he did not find her at location B or at other locations (false facts), even though he was not there. Then, to deceive him and escape, the dissembler will try to lie by saying she was at location A (the place where she thinks the man was not) and will be caught red-handed. In other words, we must deliberately lead the sly ones to lie about something whose truth we already know beforehand, in order to catch them in the act. This will only be possible if we do not let them discover what we actually know and what we actually do not know. The sly wife in question must believe that the husband checked for her presence at location B and not at location A. Once she believes that he did not check for her presence at location A, that will be precisely the place used in her lie. This is just one example among thousands.

The difficulty in catching lies lies in women's natural specialization in the art of lying, fooling, and dissembling. Therefore, we have to outdo them even in this art[42] if we want to know them. Female intelligence in the field of concealment is immense and allows them to move with ease between false and true facts, and very few men outdo them and corner them. The best way to catch a lie is by inducing the lying sly one to lie more. By the very logic of the deceptive act, the falsification must concern points she believes are unknown to us. In other words, we have to outdo the liar in the act of deceiving, fooling her in such a way as to induce her to believe that she is deceiving us. Only when we accept the lies and are more brazen than the person trying to deceive us do we discover the truth behind her intentions. Unfortunately, as Schopenhauer says, lying has become a law in this world. Therefore, to uncover a lie, it is enough to accept it instead of becoming enraged.

The act of lying and deceiving is a psychological game. The most skillful one wins. The skill consists in steering the other's beliefs. In the case of the sly ones, he who wants to discover the truth encourages, stimulates, and induces the other party to lie precisely about what is already known, carrying the deceptive act to a point where the false statements become ridiculous in their obviousness. Obviously, if the person is being sincere from beginning to end, which is difficult, you must repay such nobility of character in kind.

This tactic for dismantling lies by accepting them works for both sexes and can also be used by wives who want to unmask lying husbands. I am dealing with women who lie only as a matter of focus, since the book is about man's suffering in love.

[42] Without applying it unjustly or for selfish ends.

Lying is not something praiseworthy, but I see no better way to peacefully unmask lying people than to lead them to lie more. Even so, however, we will be on the side of truth: the truths we leave out in this counter-manipulative maneuver will be revealed to the lying person when she discovers she has been caught in the lie. So, ultimately, we do not sink so low into the vile abyss of lying when we seek to reveal falsehoods.

A characteristic common to lies, and one that often allows them to be detected quickly, is the tendency to avoid a certain subject and the resistance to addressing it, giving explanations, etc. If you mention a certain fact, place, or person and the sly one quickly tries to change the subject or steer the conversation away, this indicates that something is wrong in connection with it and that something is being hidden. Insistence on avoiding a point is a strong sign that a lie is under way or about to be told.

Female dissimulation is, and always has been, the great problem for man, because it does not allow him to know whom he is dealing with, what he should expect, what expectations to nurture, etc. By the path pointed out here, however, it can be overcome if we have the necessary calm. I must add that men who lose control end up giving reasons to be deceived. Fortunately, the sly ones are more specialized in allaying suspicions than in sustaining lies.

15. The quest for continuity leads them to insinuation

Only when they sense that male interest is about to disappear do certain women insinuate themselves on men. Insinuation, especially explicitly sexual insinuation, is the last and most desperate resource they turn to when they see no other alternative. Since they are not very fond of sex, they resort to it only as a last resort.

What motivates them to insinuate themselves is the desire for continuity of male interest, which is extremely strong and whose satisfaction directly affects female self-esteem. The desire for continuity seems to be the strongest female desire and the factor that leads them to offer themselves to those who reject them, despise them, or simply do not notice them. Any man who has ever, at some point in his life, been involved with a woman who arouses no attraction in him will know this. Instead of punishing the one who despises her with the same contempt, as would be logical, sensible, and correct, the all-but-rejected woman insistently pursues him, tries to bend him and make him reverse the way he treats her, desperately trying to be loved. The most interesting thing is that, if she really does achieve the reversal, she begins to avoid him in a measured and calculated way, for her goal of being an object of interest has been reached and, for this interest to be continuous, she now needs to excite his desires without satisfying them, but always preserving his hopes. The sly one plays with the man’s hope, and her goal is not to love him but to be loved.

The same woman who pursues a man who rejected her because she aroused aversion in him will very probably reject another who pursues her because she arouses passion, interest, and desire in him. What will determine pursuit or flight will be whether or not the violent female desire to preserve the continuity of male interest is satisfied. She only wants to keep him captive, desiring her, and nothing more.

The desire for continuity is the desire to exercise power over a man's soul by means of his sexual and affective needs, which must be inflamed to the utmost and never satisfied.

It is this desire for continuity that the seducer activates so that women will pursue him. Women seem to be highly vulnerable to male rejection, just as we are vulnerable to cleavage, miniskirts, and voluptuous female conduct.

The main female vulnerability is the desire for continuity of male interest. Obviously, there are other strong vulnerabilities, such as the desires for protection against what they fear, for having money, for humiliating their rivals, for taking revenge on those who reject them, and for satisfying their curiosity, but the desire for continuity seems to be the dominant vulnerability, to which the others are added. Envy of their rivals is what drives them to conquer a man who is accompanied by a beautiful woman. Curiosity drives them to try to attract a mysterious man. The desire for power leads them to insinuate themselves on the richest. Fear leads them to seek out protectors and leaders. But all these cases are permeated by the desire for continuity. The various female vulnerabilities reinforce one another, sketching a panorama of the emotional weaknesses through which women can be taken by idle, useless, ill-intentioned men, but also through which they could be swept away by good men, if these paid more attention to what we are pointing out.

Normally, a woman unconsciously presupposes that there is always some male desire, however faint, directed toward her. She believes, without realizing it, that the stranger walking by on the other side of the street would not refuse a sexual offer if one were made. She believes herself desired. She imagines that, if she offered herself sexually, her offer would be promptly accepted by the stranger. Some even go so far as to believe that every man is a potential rapist and, therefore, someone who desires them. This unconscious belief gives them emotional stability. It is a belief in the continuity of male interest and a need of the female psyche.

When the unconscious belief in continuity is shaken, an emotional unease drives the woman to restore it, moving toward the man who shook it.

Why do they want continuity so much? Simply because continuity gives them present and future guarantees in favor of what they desire and against what they fear or detest. A woman sees a man from a pragmatic and functional point of view. Her coldness, as regards showing solidarity with male emotional suffering, does not imply indifference to the benefits and guarantees that this very suffering provides and, to tell the truth, the more we suffer for love, the more guarantees of continuity we are giving her. Our torment in love and sexual frustration show that we are captive, chained by passion and in continuous interest in the woman who chained us.

16. A way to reverse continuity

There is a very effective procedure for binding to us a woman who wants to subjugate us through passion, whether she is a girlfriend or a wife. It consists of periodically practicing intense, wild sex, without any shadow of passionate sentimentality, combined with a protective, leading posture and with more or less prolonged absences, without the slightest shadow of harassment.

With this procedure, we can reverse the continuity of interest, making the woman continuously interested in us (wasn't that exactly what she wanted for us?) and handing back to her the spell she tried to cast on us. However, I do not recommend that you use it with several women simultaneously, nor with married women; remember that the husband is a man like you, who suffers emotional pain, and that, besides, the couple may have children whose home will be destroyed. Moreover, polygamy seems to be a chain in which a man gradually becomes the slave of an ever greater number of women, seeking satisfaction without ever finding it. In this vicious circle, the polygamist goes on stealing women who should be destined for other men. Nor do I recommend that you apply this procedure if the woman is cooperating and showing herself understanding and supportive of your emotional needs. This procedure should be aimed only at dismantling the wiles of the cheats. Considering that, in the case we are assuming, the intention of enslaving us through passion has existed from the beginning, it seems legitimate to me to hand back the dishonesty, offering ourselves as enamored slaves while flatly refusing to be such, thwarting the sly one's plans.

Conclusions

After reading this volume, I hope the reader has noticed that we (the author of this book and the authors who have inspired him since the first volume) propose peaceful resistance and inner tranquility as strategies for dismantling female perfidy. We propose a boycott of the little games, manipulations, wiles, and ruses. This boycott can only be carried out through non-action, which will demand of us the capacity to accept everything and hand back the consequences fairly. The strategy we propose is the same as Gandhi's: boycotting through silence and refusal.

As the attentive reader will already have noticed, we do not argue in favor of negative feelings or of misogynistic sentimentalism of any kind. We argue against passion and in favor of questioning and skepticism toward the myth of the defenseless, frail, inferior, and harmless woman. Those who conclude that we favor negative feelings will have distorted the work. Being free of passion is not being selfish, arrogant, manipulative, vindictive, wrathful, or furious. Negative feelings are passions too.

When a hypothesis or a polemical idea causes discomfort, it should be properly refuted, by demonstrating the flaws on which it is based, its internal logical inconsistencies, and its low explanatory power, instead of simply being disparaged. There is a difference between refuting a set of ideas and disparaging it. Mere disparagement is something subjective and vague.

Our conclusions do not go beyond the scope of love relationships, as many have mistakenly judged. Everything said here applies exclusively to the field of love and to no other. I hope I have made it clear that the proposals are valid only for stable relationships and are therefore intended only for adults.

The reader should further conclude that, in dealing with female perfidy, we are dealing with only one aspect of the whole of human perfidy, which is much broader and takes qualitatively different forms in men and in women. As was pointed out in the book, men also have their “shadow,” and there are women who do not let themselves be dominated by what they call their “dark side,” truly expressing the face of the Sacred Feminine. We have not gone deeper into these two aspects simply as a matter of focus, but nothing prevents us from doing so in the future. Thus, generalizing would be absurd, since we could never know all the people on Earth. Let it be understood that when we use the expressions “such women,” “these women,” “women,” “sly ones,” “manipulative women,” etc., we are referring exclusively to insincere women who cheat in love and not to the others. I will say nothing about the percentage incidence of the profile outlined here in the populations of the various countries, leaving this question to the reader.

Glossary

This glossary was added to the English edition and is not part of the Portuguese original. It lists the author's key concepts that appear in this book, with the original Portuguese term and the English rendering used throughout the translation.

complexes (complexos) — Used in the psychoanalytic sense; the author treats complexes, egos, and defects as near synonyms.

continuity (continuidade) — Taken from Francesco Alberoni's theory of female eroticism and reinterpreted by the author: what woman seeks is not to give sex and love continually but the continuity of male interest, which her contradictory signals keep alive without ever satisfying it.

ego, egos (ego, egos) — In the Gnostic sense used by the author (after Gurdjieff and Samael Aun Weor), the many psychological defects that make up the ordinary personality, not a single unified self.

fascination (fascinação) — The capture of consciousness by an object of desire or aversion; for the author, the same phenomenon as enchantment, bewitchment, and hypnosis.

female (vs. Woman) (fêmea (vs. Mulher)) — The author contrasts the authentic, capitalized Woman with the instinctive "humanoid female animal."

freedom from passion (desapaixonamento) — The state of a man who has eliminated the egos of romantic passion and attachment, which the author presents as the precondition for not being dominated or tormented in love.

horrification (horrorização) — The author's term, after Eliphas Lévi, for making a strong and harmless impression on a woman by contradicting her convictions about what is beautiful or correct; never a threat or real danger.

humanoid (humanóide) — The author's term for the ordinary human being: a rational animal driven by instinct and by the ego, which merely has a human appearance and has not yet become an Authentic Man.

illogicality (ilogicidade) — The apparent absurdity of female choices in love, such as preferring the men who reject them. The author distinguishes genuine illogicalities, born of psychological confusion, from feigned ones used to escape being cornered, and recommends indifference toward both.

indefiniteness (indefinição) — The deliberate refusal to define a relationship (friend, lover, girlfriend, wife), kept up to preserve doubt and to prolong the man's interest and pursuit. The author advises answering it with ultimatums or by turning it back against the woman.

passions (paixões) — In the classical philosophical sense: desires, fears, and attachments that sweep the will along, not only romantic love.

psychic aggregates (agregados psíquicos) — Samael Aun Weor's term for the egos understood as autonomous psychological formations within the psyche.

self-defense (legítima defesa) — For the author, the only case in which dismantling another's manipulations, or returning them, is justified.

sentimental selfishness (egoísmo sentimental) — The author's name for the principle that, in the war of passion, only one's own feelings matter. It drives the sly ones to judge as "logical" whatever gives them desirable feelings and to seek constant proof that the man is suffering for love.

spell, sorcery (feitiço, feitiçaria) — Used psychologically: an extreme form of fascination that works through the victim's belief and fear.
