Warning

This work should be read in a spirit of humor and solidarity, never in a spirit of revolt.

This book teaches men the art of dismantling and neutralizing female wiles in love and of protecting themselves against the emotional damage of passion, and it cannot be invoked as an incentive for, or as support for, any form of aggression. Its critical, direct, ironic, and incisive tone reflects only the pointing out of flaws, errors, and wiles, and does not signify support for any attempt to cause harm to human beings. It is one thing to dismantle the acts of women who attack us in love and to criticize them in that domain. It is something else entirely to cause them harm.

This work does not support the formation of any religious sect. The wiles denounced, unmasked, and described here correspond to feminine expressions, largely unconscious, of behavioral traits common to both genders. The profile outlined corresponds to a specific type of woman: the one who is ruled by sentimental selfishness. The author makes no pronouncement on the percentage of incidence of this profile among the female population of the various countries.

Nor does the author accept responsibility for misinterpretations, biased readings, undue generalizations, or intentional distortions that may be made under any pretext whatsoever, nor for misuse of this knowledge. Those who distort it or use it improperly will have to answer for their acts alone.

Introduction

A short while ago, I said publicly that I would not write anymore. However, necessity has compelled me to go deeper into a few more points from the previous books that were not very well understood and needed to be clarified.

The frequent questions raised by readers and the discussions with ideological friends and enemies made evident the need for one more work on how we should conduct ourselves in relation to the female psyche. This little e-book aims to fill some gaps left by the previous books. Besides that, it is also a response to the recent provocations of Amy Sutherland, who, like Karen Salmansohn, compares men in her book to animals that must be trained, and, on top of that, does so explicitly and literally.

So here is some more complementary knowledge that will help us dismantle the manipulative female wiles used to win the game of passion, to "train" us, and also to attack our feelings.

This book, like the previous ones, was not written for immature, inexperienced people, for those who seek fixed ideas, or for those who are looking for someone to tell them what to do. It was written only for those who think critically for themselves and who have or are seeking stable relationships (and who are, therefore, mature, adult people). If you are looking for a body of doctrine to submit to, throw this book away, because it was not written for you.

1. Original principles and concepts that guide the works of Nessahan Alita

Since the first versions of the books, it has been made clear and explicit that:

1. Evil and goodness exist in both sexes; my attention to female evil is merely a question of focus and of necessity for these decadent times;

2. I do not condemn women but rather their attitudes and behaviors in the present day;

3. My criticisms are limited to the women I have had the opportunity to observe in my life, and do not extend to all women in existence (so who authorized any careless reader to conclude hastily that I generalize on this point?);

4. The female behaviors I criticize are, for the most part, unconscious (therefore the criticism aims to shake women up and shock them to see whether, who knows, one of them might wake up and become conscious);

5. The goal of my texts is to help men and not to harm women, for the two things are totally distinct and separate (only sly misogynists and sly androphobic misandrists try to confuse the two on purpose);

6. We must have correct and upright attitudes so that reason is always on our side (this applies not only to dating but also to ideological wars);

7. I am in favor of what is right and not of what is wrong, and I will not give that up;

8. I do not approve of evil;

9. We should be neither evil nor promiscuous but merely acquire certain behavioral characteristics that the wicked possess without, however, becoming like them, for the path they follow is destructive for everyone, including themselves;

10. I defend the family, marital fidelity, and the voluntary submission of wives and children to the authority of the man;

11. The man has the responsibility to exercise his authority for good and not for evil, and he must pay dearly if he uses his authority to commit any abuse;

12. We must accept women's defects without rebelling;

13. We must leave women absolutely free to do whatever they want, merely giving them back the consequences of their attitudes if these are abusive (a giving back that must not be held back by fear of what might happen, not even by fear that the relationship or marriage will go down the drain);

14. A “tramp” is a woman who toys with the dearest feelings of a sincere man, and not the others (of course there are male tramps, but I deal with them only marginally);

15. I am in favor of conscious and enlightened machismo, and not of irrational and violent machismo (extremist dogmatic machismo), which is an abusive plague that reinforces androphobic-misandrist feminism;

17. I am an adherent of Gnosticism, and my philosophical conception of love and woman derives from my religion, which accepts the Koran, the Bible, and the apocryphal books as rules of life because they are messages from Heaven.

None of this is new. Everything has been explicit in the texts since the first book.

2. The types of imprisonment to woman, according to the centers of the machine.

Bond and affinity at the intellectual level

A man becomes attached to a woman through the centers of the machine. If he is attached to her only through the intellectual center, he will take pleasure in talking with her, in exchanging ideas, but he will feel little or no sexual attraction and/or romantic-amorous bond, because he is not linked to the woman in the motor-instinctive-sexual and emotional centers, respectively.

Imprisonment at the sexual level

It may also happen that we are attached to a woman only or mainly through the sexual center. In this case, we feel immense sexual attraction but no intellectual or emotional affinity with her. The bond will occur only at the level of the motor-instinctive-sexual brain, to which the sexual center belongs. The subjects she talks about will be tiresome and even irritating to us. Nor will we feel any kind of affection or romantic sentimentality. It is this type of bond that a man usually seeks with prostitutes and with women who seem highly attractive sexually to him at first sight, although sometimes he later ends up becoming emotionally attached to them and getting screwed. This is the bond that exists between the porn actress and her admirers. It is the first of the forms of bond with the opposite sex that a man fantasizes about.

Pornographic films belong to this type of bond. Men dream of imprisoning women through this center.

Imprisonment at the emotional level

There is still the third and fatal case, in which we become attached to a woman only or mainly through the emotional center. It is this form of bond that leads to tragedies, crimes of passion, and the so-called "crazy things done for love" that the sly ones appreciate so much. Romanticism and affections belong to the emotional center. When the bond, or imprisonment, occurs at this level, the man weaves little or no pornographic fantasy about the object of his adoration. She is seen more as a goddess, whose will cannot be crossed even slightly. Crossing her and defying her are considered sacrileges. It is a form of servility: the miserable state of the man in love. The sly ones try incessantly to throw us into this state, because of the material and psychological guarantees it gives them, but at the same time they feel aversion if we let ourselves fall so low. So here there is a curious contradiction: they feel aversion precisely toward those who give in to their pressure to fall in love; they pressure the man to fall in love but feel repelled as soon as he gives in to this pressure and surrenders. In other words, they feel repelled by those who do everything they want (or consciously believe they want) and meet their demands. Here is a contradiction: how can we pressure someone to do something and loathe him as soon as he complies? There is an obvious ingratitude here, visible to the man and vehemently denied by the woman. All of this belongs to the emotional center; these are games of feelings. Since female emotional intelligence is usually greater than male, males usually lose this war or game and fall into despair. Hence the outbursts of anger and fury and the crimes of passion.

Normally, the female fantasy revolves around bonds through this center. They dream of binding, through the emotional center, the males who are at the top of the male hierarchy. Of course, the intention is not altruistic. In their dreams, it is not they who submit but the men. They dream of the dominance exercised in this field.

Discovering through which center we are bound

Thus, the bond is usually more pronounced in one center than in the others. We have to observe in ourselves what type of bond we establish with a woman so that we can free ourselves. We must discover through which center we are bound primarily, secondarily, etc.

The bond is a prison

The bond is a dependence, since the woman's absence causes suffering. It is a prison, because the suffering of abstinence is relieved only by her approach and by the satisfaction of the impulses felt in the centers.

One man and several women

A polygamous man is usually bound by different centers to each of his women. This one cooks well, takes care of him like a son, and has imprisoned him through the instinctive center (filial instinct). That one is a sex goddess and has imprisoned him through the sexual center. A third will be affectionate, sweet, and tender, imprisoning him through the emotional center. The fourth may have great intellectual affinity and will be his great friend, even though now and then they have sex, for there is always some attraction, however small, in the centers other than the main one from which the involvement originates.

The type of bond can be seen in dreams

The nature of the dreams we have about women can reveal through which center we are bound. If we dream that we hug them, kiss them, or simply see them, but everything is charged with intense emotion, the dream will indicate that the bond is emotional. If we dream that we are having wild sex, the dream will indicate that the bond is through the sexual center. If we dream that we are merely talking deeply about some subject, it will indicate that the bond is through the intellectual center.

Opposite bonds in different centers

Sometimes the curious case may occur in which one person hates another and, at the same time, feels sexually attracted to that person. The aversion will be felt in the emotional center and the attraction in the sexual center. In situations like this, the sexual attraction is usually violent. A man may feel intense anger toward a woman but, in spite of that, desire her strongly for sex. If he is a misogynist, he will hate all women. On the other hand, if the person who hates is an androphobic/misandrist woman, she will hate all men, perhaps because she does not feel desired. If the contradiction is extreme, sex even comes to be used as a form of aggression against the other. That is why many misogynistic men and misandrist women are heterosexual and not homosexual.

3. Sexual attraction in woman

How female sexual attraction operates

Woman also has a sexual center and feels sexual attraction, although its keynote is much more emotional and less sexualized and genitalized than in man. The female sexual impulse is triggered much more by the action of the emotional center than by direct action on the sexual center. That is why, if a man touches a woman's sexual organ without being authorized, he will be violently rebuffed, unlike a woman who touches a man's sexual organ without being authorized. What for him is a pleasant surprise is, for her, a grave offense.

A woman's attraction to a man is motivated much more by needs and impulses of her emotional center than by a taste for sex itself. In other words, males like sex in and of itself more than women do, who seek sex for other reasons. The emotional needs that motivate them to seek sex are: material security, feeling protected, a boost in self-esteem, and victory over rivals.

Therefore, woman becomes attached to man by way of the emotional center. When her emotional needs are excited but not satisfied, she pursues him and does everything she can to keep him imprisoned to her. When the man lets himself be imprisoned, these emotional needs are satisfied and she loses interest, in a manner analogous to a man after being sexually satisfied in intercourse.

Unconsciously they want a father

The model of man that the female unconscious calls for is linked to the father figure. In a woman's memories, usually, the father led, commanded, protected, ordered her to go to bed and to take her medicine at the right time, forbade her to associate with bad company, and took many other measures for her own good. The father figure was fearsome but offered security.

It is these same sensations that she seeks, now as an adult, in a man. Whoever, instead of taking the symbolic place of the father in the woman's imagination, tries to do the opposite, submitting to her command and readily offering himself to serve her, as foolish men did in the Middle Ages, will not provide the intense sensations needed for her to fall in love. If he is accepted as a companion, it will be solely in the role of an emotional slave.

Since the father is woman's first male reference, he directly shapes her selective criterion for choosing the men destined to be seen as ideal models of fertilizing males. Was the father not the ideal male of her mother, at least in theory and according to idealized standards?

Woman needs to feel desired and loved

Beyond the selective criterion, however, there is in them an immense selfish need to feel strongly desired and loved by the greatest possible number of men, so that they can reject them. This sensation works as a thermometer by which they can measure and regulate their self-esteem, since female self-esteem depends on social approval and on victory over rival women. The more desired a woman is, the better she will feel and the higher her self-esteem will be. The more suitors she can reject, the happier she will be. The converse is also true. Therefore, this does not mean that they want to have sex with all men, nor even that they like sex, but only that the sensation of being desired and loved puffs them up, because they feel like the hottest women on Earth and better than their rivals. It is in no way an altruistic need, since the impulse to automatically reciprocate male desire and love does not exist. In fact, it is the opposite: the first impulse is to reject the pursuers and tell everyone about it, especially the other women.

This hypothesis explains why the sly ones run away and reject us when we pursue them but pursue us when we reject them resolutely and decisively because we consider them unattractive or unbearable. Regarding this detail, Eliphas Lévi wrote:

"Given such transcendental knowledge of woman, there is a further maneuver to be carried out in order to attract her attention: this maneuver consists in not concerning oneself with her, or in doing so in a way that humbles her self-love, treating her like a little girl and not letting even a glimpse of the idea of courting her be seen. Then the roles will be reversed: she will do everything [to] tempt thee, she will initiate thee into the secrets that women keep to themselves, she will dress and undress before thee, saying things such as these: '[the two of us are] among women—[here we are] among old friends—I do not fear you—you are not a man to me,' etc., etc. Then she will watch thy glances, and if she catches them calm and indifferent, she will feel outraged; she will come near thee on some pretext or other, brush thee with her hair, let her peignoir fall half open... One even finds, in such circumstances, some who risk an assault, not out of tenderness but out of curiosity, out of impatience, and because they feel aroused." (LÉVI, 2001/1855, p. 338)

"Treating her like a little girl" means: paying no heed to her capricious opinions and taking no account of her complaints, impertinences, and judgments, in addition to leading her for her own good and seriously reprimanding her for her mischief. When she is treated like a little girl by a man who does not pay her much attention, she is struck in her vanity and pride by the absence of male sexual interest, and she is also struck in her selective criterion, developed since childhood through observing her father, which is then activated. Moved by multiple simultaneous feelings (desire for revenge, curiosity, the need to reject, the search for the fertilizing male, the need for security and protection, etc.), the woman then makes advances without quite understanding why she does so. By the time she comes to her senses, she will already be offering herself.

Why they prefer the bad ones

The bad ones are preferred for the following reasons: 1) in female eyes, they seem stronger and more masculine than the good ones; 2) they are more unscrupulous in the art of dissembling, lying to them, and deceiving them; 3) they impress them excessively; 4) they allow women to perform the sacrificial role and be seen as "women who love too much," despite being mistreated, and to arouse pity in society.

The predilection for fearsome men is related to the intuition that they make good protectors, since they make people tremble with fear (an ancestral, prehistoric, caveman, animal female instinct). Let us remember, however, that fearsome men have short lives.

I do not recommend that we be bad, but that we extract what is good in them for our own benefit and take their place in women's hearts.

The rare cases of sexual pursuit by women

It is more frequent for a man to approach a woman with explicit sexual intentions than the reverse. Women pursue and approach a man with explicit sexual intent only when they are extremely hurt in their feelings, but in that case the motivation is emotional, often even vengeful, and not the desire to have sex.

The cases in which women explicitly throw themselves at men, with undisguised intentions of seducing them, are those in which they lose control over themselves because of an invasion of lower emotions related to their needs. In general, it is because they feel defeated by rival females and scorned or simply ignored by the man they all desire. This fact wounds them violently in their feelings. The girls who faint at concerts and tear the clothes off performers, as well as the crazed women who want to tear the briefs off dancers at "women's clubs" to swallow their phalus, show a motivation of the same order.

This hypothesis explains why they run away from those who pursue them and pursue those who reject them. It also explains why they pursue those who reject them but run away from them as soon as they change their conduct and begin to desire them. The solution for dealing with this hellish contradiction is to be even more dissembling than they are with us, pretending not to want them very much even when they, driven by emotional disturbance, are approaching.

This hypothesis further explains why polygamy is more frequent than polyandry as a socially accepted institution (because women prefer those who have several women and, when a man has several women, they become imprisoned to him through rivalry). And more: it explains why they become attached to those who only practice wild sex without any trace of sentimentality and abandon or cheat on affectionate romantics.

The man who shows interest after the woman has begun her pursuit will make her turn around and try to run away, with the intention of reversing the roles. On the other hand, the man who shows himself totally uninterested will make the sly one also give up pursuing him, driven by pride (she will say: “I’m not going to lower myself” or “who does he think he is?”). However, the one who lets a certain faint acceptance show through will keep the pursuit going until the moment he shows affection. If he stays in the state of uninterested acceptance up to the point of having sex with her, he may keep her imprisoned to him indefinitely.

Therefore, a man who wants to arouse interest in a woman must “attack” her correctly on the emotional side and not on the sexual side, as the wretched, clumsy Matrixian harassers do.

The rare cases in which men are pursued are not motivated by the desire for sex in and of itself, nor by love, as everyone believes, but by various other motives that disguise themselves and creep into amorous and sexual conduct. These motives, always with an emotional keynote, correspond to intentions secondary to sex and love. In other words, the sexual pursuits carried out by women are motivated by hidden interests of a nonsexual nature, such as the desire to obtain money, to enjoy fame, prominence, and power; the desire to arouse envy in rivals, to feel attractive, to be the center of attention, to have an emotional slave at her disposal, to obtain alimony, to take revenge for some slight, to secure guarantees for old age, to have the pleasure of attracting and repudiating, to enjoy the sensation of being clever by deceiving, and many other shady interests. Love does not appear on this list or, if it does, it is in last place.

Why they like to be led

Female attitudes belie the current idea, and women’s assertion, that they do not appreciate male leadership, including when it is exercised over the romantic relationship. Here is one of the reasons for this taste: it is much more comfortable, safe, and pleasant to be led, and to be able to torment the leader with criticism when he makes mistakes, than to lead. Since the true leader always leads for others and not for himself, he cannot afford to be selfish and to conduct his leadership exclusively for his own benefit. The selfish leader is quickly dethroned and banished, for there is no leadership without the support of those who are led. There is yet another reason: to be a leader, the male must destroy the opposition of the other rival males, who also aspire to reach the position of the one most desired by the females. In doing so, he shows that he is superior to his enemies and the bearer of the best genes of the species.

A being of implicit intentions

The natural dissimulation inherent in woman makes her a being who expresses her sexual interest in a man only implicitly. In the overwhelming majority of cases, she will only send implicit signals that you must be able to interpret, always with the risk that it is just a trap to mock your good faith.

Only very rarely will a woman show the sexual attraction she feels explicitly and unequivocally. No, my friend, she will never come up to you to invite you to sleep with her. The sly one will never say “I want you to take me to bed,” except in exceptional and rare situations. To believe otherwise or to expect it is tantamount to being crazy.

4. A little about approach and conquest

With the aim of helping our male friends find partners with whom they have great affinity, and not of encouraging promiscuity, let us go a little deeper into the subjects of approach and conquest.

Most studies devoted to this field are meant only to teach men to conquer the greatest possible number of women in order to fornicate, and nothing more. That is the goal of most studies in seductology. Let us occupy this field in order to provide a different alternative: not to conquer many women but to win the best partners (or, if you prefer, the least bad ones) for a stable relationship. Logically, if we are able to conquer a woman whom we like very much and with whom we have great compatibility and affinity, we will have less of a tendency to be promiscuous than if we are dissatisfied with the companion we have at our side.

The impulse to possess

When we see a desirable woman, our first and strongest impulse is to possess her immediately. We would like her to undress at that very moment and offer herself totally to us. Nothing else crosses our mind. We are seized by a kind of suffering, the suffering of lust, which often borders on despair. We become blind to everything else; we only want to possess that delicious female, we want to enter her, to unite, to be together, to fuse and disappear inside that marvelous body. We know that this suffering will be relieved only if we possess her; otherwise, the dissatisfaction will accompany us for a long time, until we forget that woman completely. It is precisely this unthinking impulse that ruins everything.

A first mistake

Driven by this impulse, we immediately show our intention. We let what we want show through. We lose control over ourselves, and our acts no longer belong to us; they become autonomous. This is our first mistake, because it has the opposite effect to the one desired, making the desired woman see us as a mere harasser and consider us, unconsciously, a mere beta male (I am not recommending that we be alpha males) desperate from having been rejected by females. Besides that, her unconscious goals of being loved and desired will already have been achieved. Why would she, who does not much like sex or men, need to get involved with us if we have already surrendered and offered ourselves on a silver platter? For the woman, the situation is settled; there is no problem that needs solving, and that is why she shows no interest, since the mere confirmation of male interest is enough to satisfy her. The sly one senses that the donkey will be tied to the tree and that she can find it whenever she wants; she feels that the dog will always come when she snaps her fingers...

Most of the time, the woman and the man are not conscious of this process and simply act and react automatically, by instinct.

What should be done

We would get better results if, instead of flaunting our brutal sexual interest, we simply aroused in the woman some interest in us and approached her only much later, after this interest had taken hold. Here is where the problem begins.

Lustful blindness leads to error

Before the desired woman, the man seized by lust finds no other way than to throw himself at her in order to obtain copulation as quickly, objectively, and directly as he possibly can. And it is precisely this desperation to take a shortcut that ruins everything.

The man in such a condition does not want to violate the woman. He believes, in his passionate madness, that his feelings are already being returned or are about to be, when in fact he is causing growing repulsion. If he persists in this insanity, he will soon be committing sexual harassment without realizing it.

If the woman in question is a tramp (a woman of bad character, insincere, who likes to harm others, a trait that does not depend on how many partners she has), she will encourage him more and more with ambiguous behavior in order to have the pleasure of harming him in the end. If she belongs to the circle of the few honest people who exist on Earth, she will quickly eliminate all the man's doubts so that he cannot hold on to any further hope. Unfortunately, the first case is much more frequent than the second.

Directions in which they are not armored

A woman's interest is aroused by the right kind of impressionism. To impress, here, means to leave a mark, to get oneself noticed, to stand out, and to make oneself remembered. Leave your mark on her imagination, just as she does with you.

A woman easily impresses a man with her beauty, tenderness, and voluptuousness, but a man will never impress a woman with these same attributes. Nor will he impress them with love letters, flowers, showing off, or, usually, with gifts, unless these are worth billions of dollars... The sly ones are very well defended, armored, and desensitized in this field. But they are not armored in others.

Basically, people are impressed through their fears and desires. Let us imagine that emotional armor is a circle. Well then, no human being, unless he has totally dissolved the ego, is absolutely invulnerable to fascination and impressionism along the whole of that circle. They may well be insensitive to letters, to declarations of love and of sexual interest, but they are not insensitive to money, to mystery, to the resolute defiance of their convictions, to being relegated to the background in favor of their rivals, to a man's singular inattention, to scorn for their beauty, to fear of a storm or other dangers, etc. In these fields, their vulnerability is total, just as ours is when it comes to the offer of tenderness and sex and to voluptuous beauty. And that is where we can leave our distinguishing mark, counter-manipulating the wile that was meant to attract us. If you show that you are truly capable of protecting her against her fears (do not be a fraud, or else she will make your life hell) and/or of fulfilling her desires, even if they are petty desires such as taking revenge on you, subjugating you through passion, and enslaving you, you will have opened the sly one's guard to leave your mark. When we do not give them much attention, treat them like little girls, cut them off from contact with us, reprimand them, or defy their convictions, we arouse in them various desires that impel them toward us for petty motives.

We are not teaching manipulation but rather the dismantling of the female manipulative act, which aims to arouse desire in us in order to attract us with bad intentions, the most irritating of which is to reject us afterward. Often, merely by being present wearing certain clothes, the female intention to manipulate the male mind in order to excite desire is unmistakably shown. Add to this glances, body postures, facial expressions, and tones of voice, always with the sole intention of stoking the male's lust so that he suffers from dissatisfaction.

On reaching female feelings

Before the Nazi-feminists fire off slanderous and silly accusations, I must make clear that here the word "reach" means to get through to and influence. This word is not used in any sense of violence or aggression.

The question that most intrigues representatives of the male sex is: what must I do to reach a woman's feelings correctly, so as to arouse her interest in me?

We cannot give a specific answer, nor a magic formula, but we can give some general answers.

First of all, you must know which behaviors arouse and maintain a woman's attraction. Roughly speaking, we could list them as follows:

1. Put on a somewhat tough-guy face, taking care not to become ridiculous;

2. Look at her in a penetrating, serious, and fearless way;

3. Show little or no interest in the existence of this woman (if you flaunt your sexual or romantic intention, she is satisfied and runs away);

4. Pay attention to the other women (the ones who do not interest you);

5. Give the impression that you have several beautiful women available and interested in you;

6. Do something sudden or defend an idea that leaves her astonished, that is, the calculated "horrification" mentioned by Eliphas Lévi (2001/1855) and also in the film “Hitch” (TENNANT, 2005).

If you act this way, her resistance will probably be broken and the sly one will become approachable or try to be friendly. If she tries, or shows herself open to contact, do not get carried away; speak to her curtly and bluntly, in a firm, deep, decisive tone of voice, as if you did not attach much importance to it.

Second, you cannot forget that they are cheats in love. Cunning as they are, they never take a risk without protection. Although she seems friendly, the sly one will only be waiting for the moment to confirm your interest so as to try to reverse the roles and induce you to chase after her. That is why you must always stay somewhat distant and somewhat closed, not being very amiable. Although somewhat open to contact, you must be somewhat impenetrable and incomprehensible.

When you notice that she is open enough to contact, you should touch her without any fear, but in a subtle and unpretentious way. You should do it with a certain dose of hypocrisy, as if you were not thinking about it, as Eliphas Lévi (2001/1855) wrote. Here, once again, the fears of rejection and betrayal can interfere.

They say that Aleister Crowley boasted of being able to make any woman fall in love with him in a matter of minutes and attributed this to a supernatural power. My opinion is that he simply applied the teachings of the master Eliphas Lévi in his own way, horrifying and impressing women with all that silly business of pacts with the Devil and Satanism. Believing that he really was a demonic being incarnate, come from the depths of hell, they felt a mixture of terror, sexual attraction, and helplessness. Well... Crowley used the knowledge to become promiscuous by fornicating, and he is surely paying for it now.

Of course, a strategy like this would only work with religious women and would be ridiculously useless if applied to convinced atheist women, who would mock the would-be seducer. In that case, what would impress them would rather be scientific authority (or at least superiority in that field). On the other hand, if the woman is a fanatical feminist, she will be impressed if the male shows himself superior to her in knowledge in the field of gender relations, even if she hates him and attacks him for holding a divergent opinion. If he is inwardly the more powerful of the two, defies her, and destroys all her arguments, she will not resist him in the end.

Most of the time, the awakening of female sexual interest in a man is diametrically opposed to all the suggestions given on the subject by the media and by literature. Believing that women are aroused by romanticism, the Matrixians, poor victims of brainwashing, pour out tons of love letters and drown them in truckloads of bouquets, triggering aversion instead of attraction. When these wretches believe, to make their situation even worse, that women are aroused by a man's showing sexual interest, they start chasing them everywhere, waiting for them at work, harassing them, throwing romantic or lewd pickup lines at them, and, in extreme cases, even trying to touch them in forbidden places without authorization. The result is that they generate hatred, disgust, and repulsion. That is how they intensify their own misfortune to the point of total catastrophe, for the result of a wrong conception of the feminine is always a disaster.

How to arouse interest

The first way is to behave as if we did not attach any importance to her, not concerning ourselves with her and not even noticing her existence, for a while. This will draw her attention to you, and you will be noticed for this difference.

The second way is to behave in the most masculine way possible: to sit, walk, move, dress, and speak like a real male, avoiding all effeminacy of manner. Short, direct speech, a firm gaze, a deep voice, and a serious, almost fearsome countenance are indispensable. It is advisable to be silent and not a chatterbox. By proceeding this way, her initial interest in you will have increased at least a little. Considering that you have good intentions, it is better for her to feel attracted to you than to some worthless, unscrupulous tramp, don't you think? So take his place. This is legitimate and fair, because you do not want to harm her, unlike the tramp. The female unconscious, unfortunately, considers the bad ones superior to the good ones and impels women irresistibly toward the former. If you do not conquer her first, some cad will inevitably snatch her up sooner or later.

Therefore, ignoring her existence, not paying her much mind, and showing oneself masculine are the first paths to arousing attraction in a woman. But the work does not end here. There is still a long way to go before reaching the level of living together.

Losing the fear of the first contact

If the woman is abnormally desirable, the man hesitates, fearful of the possibility of rejection. It is not the woman who is the source of the fear, since she is desirable, but rejection. This fear prevents a first contact from being established.

The mere adoption of indifferent postures (the tough-guy technique) generates some attraction but is not enough. It is necessary to go further, taking the right initiative of contact, on the alert to "break down her defenses" at any moment.

It is important to fight against this fear of the first contact. Otherwise, all the previous effort is useless.

They prefer those who do not fear them

When a man does not boldly approach a woman who has sent him favorable signals, out of fear of rejection or of a treacherous accusation of harassment, she assumes that the reluctance is due to a fear she inspires, and not to rational male prudence against the dire consequences that come from acts of female bad character, such as: attracting in order to reject, attracting in order to accuse, attracting into traps, attracting in order to rob and murder, etc.

Indeed, the power that women have to harm a man socially should not be neglected, a fact that justifies male prudence. Even if the sly one has sent the interested man many favorable signals, she may then accuse him of sexual harassment or simply spread the news that she is being stalked. She may also manipulate other suitors against him by stirring up rivalry. It is dangers like these that keep a good man from being bold in his approach even when he is very interested in the woman.

If the interest in the woman is truly excessive, there will also be the fear of saying or doing something wrong that results in rejection. It is a fear that makes the voice tremble and paralyzes action, as happens with fighters who fear their opponent or with certain prey before hunting animals. Fear paralyzes and hampers all freedom of action.

In none of these cases is the woman herself the feared element, but rather circumstances linked to her or caused by her. However, even if the woman has no bad intentions and is a good person, she will believe that the man feared her. Her unconscious will then react with lack of interest, considering this man weak and fearful. That is, if he dares, he will be seen as a harasser. If he does not dare, he will be seen as a coward. We then have one problem, two ways out, and a risk of failure in each!

The man then becomes the victim of a contradiction: if he dares to approach, he exposes himself to a trap. If he does not approach, he causes lack of interest. The solution seems to be to try progressively bolder approaches, based on the favorable signals sent, always ready to react at the slightest sign that it really is a trap, and without ever allowing the woman to conclude that she inspires fear. Women immediately reject a man if they believe he fears them. Hence the importance of facing them resolutely, looking them straight in the eye, and taking command of the situation. That is exactly how cads and playboys act, with the difference that they are not driven by inner strength but by contempt for the person they want to seduce.

If the woman is excessively important to you and the poison of passion has contaminated you, you will be liable to stutter, fall silent, say something stupid, become flustered, or speak in a trembling voice, not out of fear of her but out of fear of losing her. However, she will not feel the slightest sympathy for your suffering in love. Instead, she will believe that she is feared and will see you as a weakling. Therefore, whether on the phone or in person, we have to stay firm, even if inside we are about to shatter, sink, and collapse. Try to see her and treat her as a simple mortal and nothing more, a mere human being, and not as a goddess who stands above you, nor as a terrible, highly dangerous demon. Be prudent but do not be afraid, or you will lose her.

Going beyond the alpha male

Still within this initial phase, your masculinity must express itself fully but in a way superior to that of brutish alpha males. This means that you must go far beyond the alpha male. The ordinary human alpha male is aggressive, strong, a leader, but his intelligence is turned toward base and imbecilic things, which makes it limited and conditioned. The alpha male thinks only of power and fornication (will to power and sexual impulse). You must be superior to them in self-mastery, understanding, ability to find solutions, calm, inner serenity, altruism, etc. In short, you must strive to raise yourself spiritually above the humanoid beasts, whether alpha or beta. This is what Nietzsche teaches as the "Overman." This is only possible by means of the whip. We have to tame the brute animal that we are with the lash of the will. But do not forget: women do not feel sexual attraction to virtues, much less to kindness. Nor do they feel attraction to intellect. What attracts them is your social prominence and your position in the hierarchy of males. If you are dull, you will not arouse interest. If your attitudes set you apart, then you will arouse it.

How to approach

When the woman starts to become bothered by your presence or to act differently on seeing you, it means the moment has come to make contact, to approach. This moment may come after a few moments or may take hours, days, or weeks.

She will start to adjust her clothes and fiddle with her hair, concerned about her appearance. She will gesture quickly and speak loudly to be noticed. Stay calm and do not pounce! Control yourself and act as if nothing were happening.

Then, keeping calm and indifferent, make contact, putting forward some pretext other than the desire to get close. Make contact as if you did not want to make contact.

A small degree of familiarity will then have been established. From then on, it is just a matter of increasing the attraction by means of a leading and protective profile. But remember: if you satisfy her emotional interests, she will lose interest. The interest must be preserved while the intimacy grows closer.

When and how to reveal the intention?

There is much controversy. My view is that our true intention should be revealed only after the attraction has become firmly established in the woman, and never before. Otherwise, she will run off without pity, happy as can be, and leave you high and dry.

I also believe that the explicit intention should not be revealed through words but through actions, such as looking at her steadily and simply moving in calmly to kiss her, without neglecting to stay alert for any refusal. No asking whether she agrees, whether she wants this or that. The best thing is to learn to “guess” what she does or does not want, through the actions and reactions that make up a game of signals between the two. If she tries to deceive you through contradictory behavioral signals, luring you into the well-known trap of rejecting you when approached, be alert and get ahead of her, rejecting her first, to rob her of the sensation of triumph. Of course, if she tried to lure you into a trap, she is a tramp and does not deserve anyone's love. Unmask her and look for another, less insincere one.

This knowledge benefits women

Here I hope that women will thank me, instead of becoming enraged, for showing them the weak point through which they can be taken by ill-intentioned seducers. By knowing them, it will be much easier for them to defend themselves against these invasions of the unconscious.

5. A serious mistake we make

The emotional hells in which a woman's ego entangles us are possible for one single reason: our very strong desire that women be as we would like them to be, and our inability to accept reality. We would like them to be different from what they are, and this is our capital mistake.

We would like women to be spontaneously faithful and sincere, to value virtue, to return love with love, to feel aversion toward the bad ones, not to sacrifice themselves for cads, not to give themselves to good-for-nothings, to feel fulfilled in the company of men of good character. We would like them to refuse their virginity to playboys and offer it to those who truly love them. We would ardently like them to be sincere in their feelings, to understand us, not to run away from us when they realize we are in love, not to attract us with the mere intention of rejecting us, not to toy with our feelings, to value us more than the relatives and friends of their stupid social circle, to devote themselves to us as we devote ourselves to them, and much, much more!

This is precisely our mistake, and it is sometimes fatal. The expectations we create generate hell insofar as they clash with reality. Because their ego is very much alive, women are completely different from this ideal model. The idealized woman of our dreams does not exist; she is a farce, a lie. Whoever does not accept this reality goes mad sooner or later. Sooner or later he will be shocked by the facts, and his absurd Matrixian dreams will be shattered by the reality that will be violently thrown in his face. Those who do not leave the illusion beforehand and of their own will, through the dissolution of the I, usually cannot bear the shock of reality. That is when they may suffer nervous breakdowns such as "battered man syndrome."

Only those who have dissolved all childish and idyllic expectations, who have become capable of accepting the raw reality of the perversity of the female ego (and of the male ego too, but here we are dealing with women's ego), without struggling against the inevitable, are capable of living with women without going mad and without destroying themselves.

The death of our ego is the death of expectations, of desires, and also of dreams and illusions. Emotional pain comes from the opposition between reality and desire. When we consciously accept the inevitable and do not waste effort banging our heads against a wall, we stop suffering, because we begin to live in tune with reality and not with lies.

The Matrixians, in their desperate attempt to escape from reality, generally choose one of two paths: 1) they insist again and again on the insane attempt to be happy in passion, repeating the same mistakes with every woman they fall in love with, thus living from failure to failure; 2) they give themselves over to promiscuity and fornication, to try to drown their conscience and anesthetize their aching heart. When a Matrixian is abruptly torn from the illusion by a definitive fact, such as catching his wife in the act of adultery, the shock destroys all his psychological defenses. It is from that moment on that they commit suicide, murder their wives, or give themselves over to alcohol or drugs. In short: they go mad.

The Matrixian illusion is instilled in us from the moment we are born. Everyone around us, manipulated by the mass media, has drilled into our heads and shoved down our throats absurd ideas about passion and romanticism. We grow up intoxicated with this drug, and our discernment in the field of romantic relationships becomes nil. Among Eastern and indigenous peoples, this mental illness is not so frequent; marriages obey other principles and they are healthier.

Therefore, if some sly one is making you suffer, this suffering is due to an opposition between your most intense and ardent desires and the reality of your partner's psyche. The more you try to force her to fit the mold of your expectations, the worse the emotional hell will get. You will be energizing your partner's egos and fortifying the situation.

If you accept everything, the moment will come when the relationship is about to go down the drain. Things will reach the edge of the precipice. It is at that hour that you will discover who the person at your side really is and will know whether or not she has limits. You will discover what the sly one's thermometer reading is and how far she can stand the mess she has caused. I am not recommending that anyone contribute to the end of the relationship, but rather that one not struggle against the end of the relationship. Do not waste time pointing a gun at your partner, trying to force her to be different. Go with her; use the technique of psychological jiu-jitsu: do not push against.

This does not mean that you should bear the bad consequences of romantic crookery. Acceptance makes it possible to give the consequences back. Whoever does not know how to accept is left holding the firecracker, and the bomb explodes in his hand. Romantic cheating, if accepted and taken to the extreme, has bad consequences for the very person who took the initiative to carry it out, which can be summed up as contempt and the loss of esteem and admiration on the part of the person who is aware of having been cheated, as well as the loss of any and all commitment and fidelity. The person who cheats on their partner is signing a certificate of worthlessness and authorizing the partner to do whatever he wants. That person is saying: “Look, I am good for nothing, I am a worthless person, and you should not respect me in any way.” The cheat offers himself to be disrespected. This is the bad consequence of his dishonesty, which can be given back to him if the other person simply accepts his cheating and informs him that he is aware of it and that, from that moment on, dishonesty has become the rule of the relationship. If, for example, a woman stops taking care of her husband in order to go out with “girlfriends” (and we know that girlfriends tend to cover up and facilitate adultery), he is morally authorized to find another woman to fill that time. Of course, I do not recommend adultery but definitive separation. But this need not, in the case of the husband traded for the girlfriends, be done the very first time, for it may happen that the woman corrects herself after receiving a good lesson.

When I speak of total acceptance, I am referring to accepting what your partner wants to do with her own life, but not with ours, obviously. There is a limit to tolerance. We must leave her free to do whatever she wants with her life, but not with our life.

All the wiles, cheating, lies, provocations, betrayals, mental tortures, deceptions, manipulations, and other forms of emotional aggression are neutralized when we consciously accept them. The side effects of these attitudes return to the sly one herself without our doing almost anything. The acceptance must be real and not simulated. Do not pretend to yourself or deceive yourself. True acceptance results from understanding; it is not forced behavior. This is the only way to dismantle the hells: by accepting them. But for that, we have to dissolve all expectations. Therefore, living with one's partner is a psychological gymnasium, from which we can come out happy, free, and victorious, or defeated. In the latter case, we will be taken to the madhouse, the cemetery, or prison.

5. Woman's emotional aggression against man

Why they provoke double feelings

Women alternately provoke happiness and sadness in us because they simultaneously feel love and hatred for man. It is a duplicity of feelings in the personality, similar to schizophrenia.

Knowing our emotional mechanisms, they provide well-being, happiness, and pleasure at some moments, but also fury, wrath, resentment, and sadness at others, tearing us apart inside. Those who cannot bear it snap.

The female power to attack the feelings

According to common sense, women are supposedly fragile and defenseless beings, while men are supposedly strong and potentially dangerous. There would thus be a need to control the latter by means of various legal mechanisms to contain their "natural aggressiveness." This idea has been instilled in the masses by the media.

The media constantly report cases of domestic aggression, implying that men attack women without any motivation and that the latter are their "natural victims." The whole previous history of emotional violence committed by the woman who was attacked, in the cases where such violence occurred, is carefully avoided and hidden. The paradigm of the defenseless and harmless woman, combined with the idea of the dangerous and cruel male, guides statistics, scientific and journalistic articles, films, soap operas, and even public policies. To doubt it and question it is heresy. Whoever dares to scrutinize it runs the risk of being sent to the stake.

Indeed, the number of women who are physically attacked by the men they live with is high, and measures to curb such aggression are necessary and urgent. But the number of men emotionally attacked by their wives, girlfriends, and fiancées is equally high, and nobody likes to talk about that. Dealing with women's emotional aggression in love is a taboo; it causes great discomfort. But dealing with men's aggression in the home is a party, and everyone is always ready to cast one more stone.

If it is true that men who attack women physically or psychologically must be punished by law, it is no less true that women who attack men in the same way must also be punished, and with equal rigor. And here we reach the point that concerns us: why does nobody consider punishing women for psychological aggression in love?

While most men attack women physically, women usually attack men emotionally. Although there are many cases of male aggression that are totally unprovoked and cannot be justified under any circumstances, there are also many other cases in which this aggression is the consequence of a long process of emotional torture and torment perpetrated by the woman herself. Emotional pain is real and can reach unbearable levels, to the point of losing one's sanity entirely. It is felt in the heart, but its qualitative content is hard to grasp and define, since we live in a materialistic world that totally neglects the psychic aspect of life.

Emotional aggression is dangerous because it can destroy the nervous system and bring on outbursts of madness such as those of "battered man syndrome." Women are experts at carrying it out because they have much more emotional intelligence than men, who, when they snap, see no other path than the most primitive of all: to attack physically and destroy everything. The power of emotional aggression is usually neglected, even though its effects are constantly felt. There is no man who has not experienced it.

Among the forms of emotional aggression perpetrated by women against men, we can mention: marrying and refusing to fulfill the obligations of a wife; lying; behaving in a way that leaves her fidelity in doubt; going out without accounting for herself; devoting herself more to her girlfriends and to work than to the home and her husband; disparaging her husband in front of others; not allowing her ex-husband to see the children; committing adultery; frequently traveling without her husband; promising and refusing sex; demanding sexual fidelity from the man but refusing to satisfy him sexually; trading her companion for other people; faking suicide attempts; flirting with other men and denying it despite the evidence; filling her husband's head with doubts; spending all his money on useless things; doing exactly what he does not want in order to exasperate him; pushing him away when he hugs her; rejecting him as “clingy” after having demanded or allowed him to fall in love; inducing him to fall in love in order to turn him into a slave; being cold and distant; behaving in a dissembling way to confuse him; breaking off the relationship but behaving in a way that gives hope of a return; etc. Although all this seems like little to women, it is not seen that way from the male point of view. From the male point of view, this set of torments constitutes something serious and truly gives rise to violent nervous crises. Regardless of whether we like it or not, or whether we think men are childish or not for attaching importance to these aspects of romantic life, the fact is that what is important to a man seems like nonsense to a woman and vice versa. Even so, she manages to wound him unerringly in his feelings.

The range of acts that constitute emotional violence in the romantic relationship is so large that we would have to fill an entire book to describe them all in detail. Roughly speaking, however, we can sum it up in three categories and say that what most wounds and enrages a man in the romantic relationship is: the indefiniteness, the dissimulation, and the contradictions of female behavior.

Human beings need certainties to remain emotionally healthy, especially in the field of love. Indefinite, dissembling, and contradictory behaviors steal certainty and cause emotional and mental stress, with results that are highly harmful to the couple, but especially to the man, since there are no laws that protect him against the psychological aggression of his companion.

The certainties a man needs to remain healthy are, mainly, the certainty of his partner's fidelity and of being loved in return by her, in the romantic and sexual field. The doubts that torment him are the suspicion of being deceived and cheated in this field. For a man, sex and love, although separate, are extremely important, and he cannot bear betrayal in either of the two fields. The mere idea that he might be being traded in is already sheer hell. The reason for this is that the contemporary human male is as territorial as in the time of the caves and will never stop being so, because instincts cannot be suppressed or denied. Woman also has caveman instincts, but nobody wants to admit it so as not to disturb the myth of the harmless and defenseless goddess. Among the various forms of emotional aggression that can be committed against men by their women, the most destructive are those that fall within the scope of marital fidelity, and this should be taken much more seriously by psychiatrists and psychologists.

Generally, the end of the marriage and separation strike a man violently in the heart, not least because it is almost always he who leaves the house and does not keep the family. The separation, the end of the family, and the ex-wife's union with the lover she hid for many years are the powder keg. The adulteress's disdain is the fuse. The result is a psychotic break.

The psychopath who kidnaps his own children and his wife, murders them, and then commits suicide is not born overnight. He takes shape over several years of exposure to many forms of violence at the level of the feelings. If it were a simple case of “bad character” or cruel crookery, he would never commit suicide; he would simply flee far away. The suicide indicates that the wretch has gone mad and wants to be with his family forever, in the other world.

It is right to punish husbands who physically attack their wives. But it is not right to leave unpunished the wives who emotionally attack their husbands. If we want to put an end to domestic violence between couples, we cannot allow any of its causes to remain, and the emotional aggression perpetrated by women is one of those causes.

6. Some hellish female wiles

The wile of suddenly disappearing

You are as happy as can be with your girlfriend. Everything is going well, and she is behaving marvelously. So you lower your guard, confident that she is being absolutely sincere and that she will not betray you.

Suddenly, without the slightest warning, she disappears, stops looking for you, and/or stops answering your calls and does not call. You have fallen into a trap: she was only waiting for the right moment to pull away so that you would suffer.

For days she watched you and behaved so as to build trust. You were baited like a fish, and now the hook has been pulled. The sly one is testing you; she wants to be sure the fish is well hooked. If you chase after her, you will fall even deeper into the servitude of passion. If you do not chase after her, you feel you will lose her. What was your mistake? Letting yourself get drunk on the good moments.

What to do now? I see two possibilities. The first is to face inwardly the anguish and torment that are eating you alive. The emotional pain that oppresses you comes from passion, and passion is totally internal. Whoever overcomes passion within himself and develops the will manages to win these “tugs-of-war” simply by disappearing. The second is to reach her by some means and corner her with an ultimatum. Both are painful, and neither can guarantee the return of your beloved. I in no way suggest that you humiliate yourself by pursuing her desperately, because that will make everything worse.

If you had behaved correctly, she would not have sabotaged you treacherously in this way. She pulled this crooked trick on you because she noticed that you had begun to surrender. If you had not surrendered, the sly one would still be trying to convince you to do so and would be at your side, since that is the only thing that keeps them attached to us: the attempt to induce us to surrender our hearts.

The wile of sabotaging and pretending nothing is happening

All of a sudden your girlfriend becomes strange, cold, and distant and treats you differently. You get worked up, and your mind races, thinking a thousand things. The sly one denies that there is anything strange, plays dumb, and acts as if nothing were happening. You question her and want to wring an explanation out of her by force. The more you argue, the hotter the hell gets. Observe yourself: with this behavior, you are communicating that she has hooked you through your feelings. Without realizing it, you are saying: “Look, I am desperate with passion; I need your tenderness and your attention more than anything on this Earth. You are the hottest woman in the world.” It so happens that this is exactly what she wants to hear so that she can pull away even more. The sly one wants to test you, once again. She wants to see whether you get upset, whether you miss her tenderness and attention. What to do?

In your place, I would simply treat the sly one the same way she was treating me. There would be only one difference in my treatment: I would be a little worse than she was. I would become even stranger, more distant, colder, more indifferent, and would deny everything, giving the hell back to her. I would refuse the emotional hell that was offered. But this requires freedom from passion and a powerful will.

The wile of suddenly stopping calling

Everything is fine between the two of you and, suddenly, out of nowhere, she stops calling you. She wants to test your passion; she wants to see whether you keep calling insistently like a desperate man. First solution: do the same to her, but for much longer. Second solution: give her an ultimatum. Third solution: ignore her forever and find another, better woman. Your mistake: not having set beforehand a maximum number of days for her to call you, after which it would be settled that SHE had decided to end the relationship.

The wile of ending the relationship unresolved

Because they are illogical and contradictory, the irritation of doubt does not affect them as much as it affects us. In fact, it really seems that unresolved and confused situations please them.

Without giving any account or explanation, and without anything having gone wrong, she simply loses interest and leaves you. There is no logic at all in this behavior, apparently... But there is a hidden, unconscious logic: you will remain imprisoned to her precisely because you do not understand what happened. The question mark will remain in your head. This will make you keep thinking about the sly one for many months or even years, asking yourself and speculating about it... Intuitively, your suffering is sensed from a distance, in a way that borders on the paranormal.

I see no other solution to this hell than foreknowledge of this fatal and inevitable tendency. A man must anticipate it and remain continually expecting this form of emotional betrayal, which usually comes sooner or later. The only case in which it seems not to occur is when the man already presupposes such abandonment and expects it, or else when the man really wants the woman to go away forever... Once again, your mistake was passion, the fear of losing her, the strong desire to have her for yourself and close to you.

If this misfortune has already befallen you, a first alternative, for the bravest, is to reach her and give her an ultimatum: "Either you come back by tomorrow or never look for me again!" Then the truth about the sly one's feelings will be revealed, and no doubts will remain. But do not do this if you are not prepared for the worst. Getting another, even prettier girlfriend usually works too, because the sly one will conclude that she misjudged you and dumped an interesting guy. Then she may come after you again. If there is a chance that she will see you fairly often, as when both of you work or study together, it will also be an excellent opportunity to change your conduct, showing yourself different and interesting.

If you do not want to give the ultimatum, then you should act as if nothing had happened, to give the hell back to her. But this too is very hard to bear. Under no circumstances become a harasser or pursue her trying to wring answers to your questions out of her. Pursuit polarizes the situation even more in the sly one's favor and against you.

Remember: in love they are absurd, so do not look for coherence. Accept the absurd and adapt. Not even they themselves can explain themselves without confusing the situation even more.

If there is no passion, there will be no suffering. When she treacherously disappears, you will simply turn your back and move on to another. I think that no being who betrays another's sincere feelings deserves any form of consideration or importance, unless that being repents and changes conduct. Whoever betrays the sincere feelings of another is simply confessing that he is a person without worth.

The wile of provoking love and hatred

She treats you like a ping-pong ball. She pleases you and enrages you alternately or even simultaneously. She does what you hate and also what you adore. Her intentions are to learn your limits and measure how far you can be manipulated. The sly one wants to know the limits of your fury; she wants to "take your temperature" and also to test ways of calming you down. As Karen Salmansohn taught, she is training the dog, taming the beast. The solution: place yourself "beyond good and evil," as Nietzsche said, not letting yourself be emotionally manipulated either to the left or to the right; be master of yourself, neither love nor hate, transcend. This will frustrate her, because she will not be able to get to know you.

The wile of going against our wishes

She behaves well while she watches you. When she confirms that you like her a lot and discovers what pleases and displeases you, she begins to do exactly what you do not want. The solution: accept it and encourage her to keep doing exactly that until she comes into conflict with herself.

The wile of lying

She says marvelous things, and you sense some inconsistency. What she is saying is too good to be true. The solution: pretend to believe the lie and encourage her to lie even more, to the extreme.

The wile of offering sex and not giving it

She fills you with hope, promising what you like best: intense sex. She makes advances and behaves as if she really were a fatal female, but she does so only at moments when it is impossible to actually fulfill the desire she has kindled in you. When a chance finally comes along, the sly one invents an excuse and leaves you frustrated.

The solution: do not get excited about the advances and offers; ignore them, and unmask the farce before it happens. It also helps never again to approach her sexually, but only to accept her when she comes to you, so that she strongly suspects she has been dismissed from her sexual role.

The wile of provoking physical aggression

This is one of the worst of all. The woman provokes the man in various ways, doing everything he loathes, with the intention of irritating him more and more, to induce him to lose control and attack her. The motivations may be various: wanting to draw people's attention, testing the man's physical strength or self-control, feeling the thrill of seeing him lose his head, playing the poor little victim before neighbors and family, having grounds to demand the end of the relationship, feeling protected by other men induced to defend her because of the scandal, enjoying the adrenaline rush, etc.

Never fall into this trap. Stay far away from this kind of woman. If you run into one of these witches, simply withdraw and leave her silently, without arguing. Such cases are beyond recovery.

7. The obsessive female quest for the continuity of male interest

Let us now develop some implications of Francesco Alberoni's (n.d.) confused and poorly explained theory of continuity.

Alberoni was a genius in detecting continuity in female eroticism but, unfortunately, his explanations fall short when it comes to clarity. The way he explains his theory of continuity, the reader is led to believe that woman is permanently interested in giving sex and giving love, which is false. The reality is precisely the opposite: woman wants both to be offered to her (and not taken) continually so that they can be rejected; that is, she longs for the continuity of male interest; she wants to receive constant proof that the man is interested in her. She does not want to offer sex and love full-time.

Behavioral contradiction aims at continuity

Ambiguous female behavior, which communicates interest and lack of interest simultaneously, aims to maintain the continuity of male interest. The preservation of the continuity of interest, and not the satisfaction of this interest, is the most important, if not the only, goal of all this disconcerting conduct based on sending contradictory signals.

Contradiction preserves desire

Male interest is preserved by contradictory female conduct because it does not allow desire to be satisfied and, at the same time, keeps it from being directed toward a rival female. Contradictory conduct binds desire to whoever adopts it.

We can reverse the game of pursuit by adopting contradictory postures instead of the usual coherent male conduct.

Coherent conduct extinguishes desire

When a woman acts in an absolutely coherent and definite way, showing only interest or only lack of interest, clearly, explicitly, and totally unequivocally, one of two things may happen:

1) If the woman is interested, the man's advances will be accepted, his desire will be satisfied, and male interest will be momentarily lost;

2) If the woman is not interested, the man's advances will be clearly rejected, no doubts will remain, he will no longer waste his time like a sucker, and he will go after another woman.

In both cases, the continuity of desire will be lost. That is why the sly ones avoid definite conduct at all costs. And that is also why it is we who pursue them in search of sex and not the reverse. If we knew how to play with indefiniteness, it would be they who pursued us. It is a selfish and negative emotional intelligence.

There is no limit

In the obsessive quest for continuity, anything goes: lies, cheating, mental and emotional tortures, torments of doubt, betrayals, adulteries, etc. What matters here is preserving the continuity of the man's interest, regardless of the suffering this causes him. Dissimulation lies at the very core of the contradictory conduct that preserves continuity.

The continuity sought is not that of the interest of a single man but, preferably, of all the men on Earth, if that were possible, so that all of them could be rejected. They do not want to sleep with all of them, but they want to have the power to reject all those they can.

Even when they break off a relationship or ask for help from the law or from men to keep away an obsessed suitor, ex-lover, or ex-husband, the sly ones want, deep down, to preserve the continuity of his interest, for some future possibility. Even though they want him far away, they want him interested all the same. That is why they send subliminal signals that keep the wretch's hope alive while openly stating that they no longer want him.

Of course, this whole mechanism is unconscious most of the time, but it is real all the same.

Fighting fire with fire

When it is absolutely impossible to convince them to behave in a coherent and clear way, an impossibility that is very frequent, the only solution left to us will be to outdo them in this field, being even more contradictory than they are with us. But for that, total detachment and total freedom from passion are necessary.

Male conduct is usually clear and definite, which allows the sly ones to know with mathematical certainty what our real interests and feelings are. The ideal would be for the signals we send to be contradictory, leaning more toward showing lack of interest than interest, but still alternating according to the situations and needs that arise.

The desire for continuity can mobilize them

It is the desire for continuity that drives a woman to mobilize herself and go after a man who has rejected her or who stands out and does not notice her presence.

It is also this same desire that makes them “run away” from those who “pursue” them and show no interest at all in those who have already shown themselves interested in them in advance, such as devoted husbands, sincere boyfriends, and every well-intentioned man in general. In this case, female inertia and “flight” are due to the fact that this desire has already been satisfied by the inexperienced man. If the man has already shown himself interested, for her things are settled. Why should she go to the trouble of arousing his interest?

Conclusions

As we conclude this last volume, we hope the reader has understood what follows.

The only way to face romantic problems is a sober emotional state.

Passion is a great harm.

The sexual attraction felt by woman differs qualitatively from the attraction felt by man, and her desire is much less genitalized.

Not all women are defenseless.

Not all men are good.

Not all women are bad.

Female behavior is governed by the desire for the continuity of male interest.

Negative feelings harm man in his relationship with women.

The small margin of human free will can be increased.

People of both sexes can change when they decide to become conscious and acknowledge their weaknesses.

It is not legitimate to manipulate others, but it is legitimate to dismantle their attempts at manipulation.

Our observations about the feminine and the masculine are not valid for every person in the universe.

When we use expressions such as “sly ones,” “these women,” “women,” “such women,” etc., we are referring solely to those who have not been excluded from the profile we were interested in examining in detail.

We do not want to create any religion.

Glossary

This glossary was added to the English edition and is not part of the Portuguese original. It lists the author's key concepts that appear in this book, with the original Portuguese term and the English rendering used throughout the translation.

alpha male (macho alfa) — The dominant male of ethology, as used in discussions of attraction.

centers of the machine (centros da máquina) — Gurdjieff's centers of the human machine: intellectual, emotional, motor, instinctive, and sexual.

continuity (continuidade) — Taken from Francesco Alberoni's theory of female eroticism and reinterpreted by the author: what woman seeks is not to give sex and love continually but the continuity of male interest, which her contradictory signals keep alive without ever satisfying it.

ego, egos (ego, egos) — In the Gnostic sense used by the author (after Gurdjieff and Samael Aun Weor), the many psychological defects that make up the ordinary personality, not a single unified self.

female (vs. Woman) (fêmea (vs. Mulher)) — The author contrasts the authentic, capitalized Woman with the instinctive "humanoid female animal."

freedom from passion (desapaixonamento) — The state of a man who has eliminated the egos of romantic passion and attachment, which the author presents as the precondition for not being dominated or tormented in love.

horrification (horrorização) — The author's term, after Eliphas Lévi, for making a strong and harmless impression on a woman by contradicting her convictions about what is beautiful or correct; never a threat or real danger.

humanoid (humanóide) — The author's term for the ordinary human being: a rational animal driven by instinct and by the ego, which merely has a human appearance and has not yet become an Authentic Man.

impressionism (impressionismo) — The author's word for the art of making an impression: leaving a mark on a woman's imagination through the fears and desires against which she is not armored, rather than through love letters, flowers, or declarations.

indefiniteness (indefinição) — The deliberate refusal to define a relationship (friend, lover, girlfriend, wife), kept up to preserve doubt and to prolong the man's interest and pursuit. The author advises answering it with ultimatums or by turning it back against the woman.

Matrixian (matrixiano) — The author's coinage, after the film The Matrix, for the man who lives inside the illusions about passion and romance instilled by the media and therefore acts against his own interests with women.

passions (paixões) — In the classical philosophical sense: desires, fears, and attachments that sweep the will along, not only romantic love.

sentimental selfishness (egoísmo sentimental) — The author's name for the principle that, in the war of passion, only one's own feelings matter. It drives the sly ones to judge as "logical" whatever gives them desirable feelings and to seek constant proof that the man is suffering for love.

ultimatum (ultimatum) — In the author's strategy, a final demand that forces a definite decision.
