Supplementary Texts

By Nessahan Alita, 2008

Citation data:

ALITA, Nessahan (2008). Supplementary Texts. Independent online edition.

Keywords:

passionate love - inner development - magnetism

Contents:

Introduction

1. Going deeper

2. Accepting and getting around the barriers

3. The game of blockages and hopes

4. Man is not the only one to blame for desiring

5. Violent behavior and disillusionment

6. Ambiguous behavior

7. Family decline

8. Generating attraction

9. Meanings of the sexual act

10. Disagreements with seductology

11. A vicious circle

12. The infinite postponement

13. Affective aggression

14. On being strategic

15. Some types of women who do not deserve trust

16. Male self-power

17. Why they are so fascinating

18. On the levels of approach

19. On enchantment

20. On the revolt against reality

21. Passionate love and lust

22. Reinforcing the pillars of the theory

Contraindications

Introduction

With the aim of helping those who sincerely study my books in order to understand them, and not to distort them, I have prepared additional explanations meant to make their contents clearer and more comprehensible.

I sincerely thank and congratulate all the readers, communities, and groups that are striving to defend the correct interpretation of my texts.

I hope, in this way, to have contributed a little more to the good progress of these studies.

I will say nothing more for now.

1. Going deeper

Exceptions

Sincere women, coherent in their attitudes, who do not cheat in love and have overcome or are struggling to overcome their dark side (which we all have within us), do not feel alluded to by my unfavorable criticisms. In any case, these criticisms are not directed at people but at specific behaviors in the field of love (cheating, wiles, insincerity, sly tricks, manipulation, little games, etc.).

It would be absurd to take a position against either gender, since we all need the opposite pole, which is what we lack and what complements us. However, it would be wrong to justify the sentimental selfishness that can cause harm to others.

The attractive ones

“Ugly” women are, very often, those who do not seek to be attractive, who neither dress nor behave in a way that awakens attraction and gets them considered “beautiful.” Beauty is something subjective and lies in the eyes (or rather, in the mind) of the beholder.

Unjust accusations

The woman who does not want to be approached or courted does not make herself attractive.

It is a contradiction to want to be desired and to try to harm those who desire her with accusations and protests. The common male, as a rule, has no control over his sexual desire and, for that reason, should not be provoked.

There is an undue transfer and imputation of blame when provocative women act and speak as though they were not, at least partially, responsible for the activation of male desire. In the genesis of man's copulatory impulse, the female responsibility consists in being attractive, and the male responsibility in not fighting against the fascination of the attractive attributes.

The transfer of blame is a wile to exempt oneself and a trap to make the other believe himself guilty and feel responsible.

Protecting oneself

Constant skepticism regarding good intentions and sincerity is the best form of protection against the inevitable wiles, dissimulations, frustrations, and cheating[1].

Sudden abandonment

A sudden disappearance can have various motivations, multiple causes. In general, it seems to signal two situations: 1) the runaway feels nothing for us; 2) she still feels something very weak for us. In both cases the need for contact is not enough to move her.

[1] Skepticism is gradually attenuated as we confirm the sincerity of the person with whom we are involved. I am only drawing attention to the need not to be naive.

The reasons for sudden abandonment are: falling in love with another man who has greatly impressed her, disappointment at our poor sexual performance, excessive security (well-being) brought about by the satisfaction of the desire for continuity, a desperate attempt to "turn the boat around" arising from the excessive insecurity caused by feelings of continual rejection.

Unresolved feelings

The obsessive pursuit of continuity leads them to perform juggling acts to break off the relationship without our feelings being resolved, while theirs remain completely clear and defined. That is what they are after: to leave the relationship with their feelings resolved, leaving us in the confusion and the unbearable irritation of doubt.

Unresolved feelings come from doubts and unanswered questions.

Narrowing the distance of intimacy

The various levels of approach can be marked by the intimacy of physical touches, in this order: touches on the arms, on the hands, on the face, kisses, hugs, and permitted caresses on normally "forbidden" parts. As we increase the intimacy, let us be attentive to favorable and unfavorable reactions, as well as to possible betrayals.

"Hypocritical touches"[2] constitute an indirect strategy for increasing physical intimacy in order to assess the feasibility of bolder moves such as, for example, asking them out or kissing her.

The correct approach requires detecting favorable subliminal signals and having convincing excuses for the contact.

[2] A term used by Eliphas Lévi. Supposedly unpretentious touches are "hypocritical" in a metaphorical sense. It is a dissimulation of one's real intentions, demanded by the woman herself.

Silent subliminality

Let us learn to communicate in silence what we want, to transmit messages through our attitudes and not only through speech. Let us learn to read what is transmitted to us through body language and through situations.

Deceived by the lie

One mistake is to consider oneself bound to, the owner of, and responsible for one's partner's life, to consider her unique, special, different, irreplaceable, and to believe that without her life has no meaning.

Set free by the truth

Through realistic reflection and observation, we rest in understanding and destroy illusions, misconceptions, and fantasies. That is how we enjoy the disinfecting action of truth.

The evil of love

Passionate love is a weapon that makes possible the subjugation of man.

The logic of the worst

It is better to anticipate and foresee the cheating, expecting it beforehand because it is practically inevitable, than to naively expect sincerity and have to dismantle it after it has taken hold. However, if something good comes, it will always be a bonus.

Surprising them

Feigning interest and even a tiny bit of pursuit is a good way to surprise them, then going to the other extreme, with acts that communicate disinterest.

Micro-phone calls

Sly ones who are very resistant to dialogue are more efficiently dealt with through extremely short phone calls, although sometimes we can even stretch the conversation a little with striking subjects (provided that the initiative to hang up is ours).

Condemnation

We like women desperately, while women do not like us all that much, but like themselves much more. The reason is that they are the most important element for the preservation of the species, which is why nature turned us into their instinctive and expendable slaves[3]. That is why we are seen as a kind of necessary evil and are discarded as soon as we are no longer of use.

As is very logical and natural, men do not like men and... women do not like men very much either, although they like themselves a great deal! That is why misandry may perhaps never be extinguished.

Against man

My work proposes the psychological death of man and not of women. It is, therefore, against the male gender and not against the female gender, since I do not hold out great hopes of transformation with regard to the latter.

To propose to man that he die psychologically is to propose that he fight against himself. If I propose to man that he fight against himself, then I am proposing to man that he fight against man himself (himself). In proposing to man a fight against man, I am proposing a fight against the male gender.

The male gender, as it currently stands, is full of defects and problems, and must disappear to make way for a new man. The outdated male, suffering and obsessive, devotee of neurotic and compulsive love, needs to die inwardly so that the male of the future may be born.

[3] This does not mean that we should resignedly accept this situation.

Animal sexuality

Observing the males of various species, I found that, just like us, they become desperate for lack of sex and lose their sense of reality. When deprived of females, dogs try to copulate with legs and trees, turtles climb on top of melons, bulls jump barbed-wire fences in search of a distant cow in heat, horses and donkeys chase people with an erect penis, and roosters become highly aggressive. The same does not seem to occur with their females, which remain calm and tranquil for a long time. When excessive abstinence finally makes itself felt in them, it is solely in the form of nervousness and "short fuses" (the animal attacks other animals or its keeper more easily, for example), but not as attempts to force copulation with beings of another species or with physical objects[4]. This male peculiarity ought to be taken into consideration when judging the infidelity and promiscuity of the human male. There is not much difference, in this respect, between us and the other animals.

Recently, an animal breeder told me that it is not uncommon for females in heat to reject the advances of the males, attacking and irritating them, only to give in after exhaustion. Does the reader see any similarity with human behavior?

The quests of man and woman

In man, there is a desperate quest for intense erotic sensations. Analogously, in woman, there is an uncontrollable quest for exaggerated emotional sensations. This unbridled quest can lead them to destruction.

[4] This fact leads me to suppose that females are impelled to mate by motives totally different from those that impel males, that is, the pure and simple desire to physically feel the sexual act.

The male mind is constantly bombarded with appeals to extreme erotic satisfaction, which can result in destructive perversions of the sexual instinct.

Complexes

Inferiority and persecution complexes lead women to consider prejudiced all the critical observations, disapprovals, and pointing out of differences that we make about them. When we point out differences or express discontent, we are immediately labeled "misogynists." Complex-ridden reasoning tends to be quite simplistic and flimsy: "If he criticized, it's because he doesn't like us."

Also motivated by a complex is the female tendency to want to do everything we do. This compulsive imitation of our behaviors is due to the penis envy complex.

We condition them

We accustom them to the idea that they do not need what we have to offer. We condition them to believe that they possess a highly desirable treasure that cannot be paid for at any price. Through pursuit, insistence, and pressure, we condition them to refuse, as far as they can, the best of what they have and to avoid handing over these supposed treasures until the very last moment. We give the act of rejection a function that increases desire. The value that a woman places on her precious possession (sex-affection-love) is a reflection of the value placed on it by man, since values are not created unilaterally. They find themselves in the comfortable position of someone who does not need to please because she already has something the other seeks desperately.

The one who chases is always the one who believes he needs what the other has.

Indifference toward the haughty ones

With snobbish women, it is not enough to show indifference; one must go further, showing specific rejection. The pride of the arrogant ones, once broken, spurs them out of their inertia. Attitudes of rejection are: crossing to the other side of the street, moving away when she approaches, paying attention only to her friends and rivals while ignoring her, refusing contact, etc.

Betrayed by questions

To fill a woman with questions is to reveal our interest in her and, therefore, to drive her away, satisfying her desire for continuity. Questions that should never or almost never be asked are: "Do you like me?", "Did you miss me?", "What do you think of me?", "Do you find me interesting?", "What kind of man do you like?" and others like them.

Such questions communicate male weakness to the female subconscious, betray a concern with catering to the woman's whims, and drive her away.

Attraction is established and maintained only when one communicates vast previous experience and confidence in dealing with women. In other words: they must think that we are great studs and that we are used to having many women, and the best ones!

In arguments

In an argument, man tries to strike woman predominantly in the intellect, while woman tries to strike him in his feelings.

With irritating and provocative women, almost no dialogue is possible. If we return the provocations, transferring the state of irritation to them, they lose it in a fury. If we accept the provocations, we suffer from the anger and are lowered in their eyes. The solution that remains is to isolate them, talking little and hardly interacting, except for sex, if that is the case.

They are invulnerable to logical attacks. Logical attacks do not touch them. That is why “discussing the relationship” always makes everything worse.

The ability to fall silent inwardly and not let oneself get drawn in is of great value in such situations. It requires resistance to the terrible magnetism of other people’s speech.

The power of aggression

Before getting involved or entering into an ideological confrontation with women, it is advisable to give due consideration to the people of both sexes and the groups that they can manipulate against us.

Besides the ability to wound unerringly in the feelings, the female power of aggression involves the manipulation of people of both sexes against the enemy. It will not necessarily be used in a just and honest way, or in self-defense.

Female power

The power of women is the power to manipulate the feelings and thoughts of other people and groups, of both sexes, through whom they command the societies in which they live and also the men who hold power.

Selfish intelligence

When I say that female non-rationality and illogicality are a misunderstood form of intelligence, I am saying that they are, among other things, a form of slyness and cunning. It is an intelligence employed almost exclusively in the field of affective relationships and extremely difficult for the layman to understand; he finds himself disconcerted and confused before the sophisticated juggling acts performed to put him and keep him in the position of the one in love or, at least, in the position of one who needs and desires. It is an intelligence whose effect is to subjugate man through his own passions. It seems legitimate to me to use it in self-defense and illegitimate to use it as a form of abuse and exploitation.

Agreements

I agree with Dr. Donatella Marazziti: passion is a form of obsessive-compulsive disorder.

I also agree with Machado de Assis, in his work "The Alienist," with Olavo de Carvalho, in his work "The Collective Imbecile," and with Nelson Rodrigues: the opinion of the majority is quite often insane and may very well be wrong. The reason is that this opinion is manipulated by those who are in a position to control the means of communication and the opinion-forming apparatus.

Songs

In romantic songs composed by men we generally perceive feelings of guilt and laments over the loss of the beloved woman. The lyricist feels solely responsible for his own suffering in love, thinks the woman is completely right to mistreat him and betray him, begs her to forgive him and come back, etc.

In romantic songs composed or sung by women, the tendency is the opposite: they assert that they are right, accuse their partner, say they do not need him for anything and, frequently, order him to get out of their lives forever and never come back.

Women's songs rarely exalt the masculine, and men's songs frequently exalt the feminine. Both kinds tend to attack the masculine. Since songs are enjoyed by millions of people, they reflect and make evident the collective mentality prevailing in our time.

Signs of being in love

Unmistakable signs that one is in love are: thinking constantly about the beloved, dreaming about her, frequently mistaking other similar women for her when their backs are turned, following them to look at their faces in order to confirm their identity, an immense desire to see her, a violent impulse to embrace her and, finally, a certain specific emotional pain, felt as sadness in the heart. If you have these symptoms, it is very likely that you have eaten the poisoned apple of passion.

On the opponents

The adherents of dialogical-mental chaos, among whom I include the gratuitous and passionate opponents of my theories, try to win arguments by confusing and not by clarifying. To do so, they resort to the wile of not allowing the opponent to conclude each thought separately. They repeatedly throw out multiple questions, one after the other, and several successive subjects, without sticking to or going into any of them. They problematize many things at the same time and avoid dealing with each one in turn until it is clarified. They flatly refuse to deal with each problem in isolation until it is exhausted and clarified. In other words: they hate clarity and well-founded conclusions.

They are adherents of chaos and ignorance. They also enjoy inventing the most absurd shady and fictitious intentions in order, next, to attribute them to us. They do so with the naive aim of intimidating us with their ridiculous accusations, so that we will give up developing our thoughts.

The extermination of our values

Male values are the target of a campaign of extermination in Western countries, at least as far as romantic relationships are concerned. Male demands for exclusivity, certainty, definition, clarity, and fidelity in marriage, and even in dating, are seen as acts of psychological violence. Curiously, when such demands come from the woman they are taken as inalienable rights.

Complainers

Women are capable of adapting to opposite situations, finding at both poles of such situations various reasons to complain. That is why they are never satisfied and why trying to satisfy them is a waste of time.

The war of passion

What will determine victory in the war of passion is not whether the other person will stay with us forever or whether the relationship will end, but rather the image of us that she will take with her, even after everything has definitively ended. It is better for us to end a relationship and come out victorious (isn't that what they usually do to us, disappearing abruptly?) than to prolong it and come out defeated, since, in both cases, the woman will, in the end, be lost either way. Of course, the initiative to end a relationship is only justified when failure is inevitable.

In cases of persistent doubts that will not yield in any way, we can also adopt the tactic of simply giving up all expectations and hopes, without formally breaking up with the woman. Then the truth ends up revealing itself. Owing to the paradoxical female nature, it is by giving up on winning that one wins the war of passion.

Pessimism

People do not understand Schopenhauerian pessimism. They suppose it to be a kind of eternal lamentation associated with the masochistic cult of sadness when, in truth, it is a realistic stance in which one gives up seeking happiness in life because one understands that it can only be found in death. By life read "matter" (body), and by death read "spirit" (soul). When the desire to live dies, sadness dies too, and happiness is attained.

It is not possible for us to be happy in love because it is not possible for us to be happy in any way in this life. Happiness lies in the death of the desires and the passions, which, taken together, constitute what we have agreed to call the "I"[5].

Those who say they are happy in their passions are deceived or are lying. Old age, pain, sickness, the loss of loved ones, and helplessness before physical death are there to prove them wrong. We human beings are dis-graced wretches (deprived of the Grace of the Spirit).

Mutual destruction

When a man identifies with the dark side of women, letting himself be affected by it, he constellates his own dark side within himself. Then both shadowy faces relate to each other in a way that is inevitably destructive for both. Crimes of passion are there to prove it.

Several paths

In dealing with women there is not just one path to be followed, but several. The paths vary according to the situation. I do

[5] This death has nothing to do with physical death. It is the overcoming of weaknesses, desires, fears, and all the other psychological defects. In a certain sense, it is what the traditional religions understand as "freeing the soul from sin." We all have millions of defects that need to be dissolved in order to achieve the true liberation of the soul from suffering. For further study, I suggest that the reader research the subject within contemporary Gnosticism.

not provide ready-made recipes; I propose provisional theoretical keys that must be refined.

Murphy's law

Love is governed by a pessimistic law: the people who fall in love with us and pursue us are precisely those we do not want, while those we ardently desire usually avoid us. It is Murphy's law in action. This law was already known to the ancient sages long before Murphy formulated it.

The law of attraction

Murphy's law is complemented by the law of attraction. When we ardently desire someone, we unconsciously believe that that person is inaccessible to us or far beyond our reach. This unconscious belief governs the unfolding of events and leads us to undesirable and unlucky results, because "reality" is constructed by the mind, which selects parts of an absolute and infinite whole to construct its own private world. If we modify our unconscious beliefs, which is not easy, we also modify reality. Each belief that we carry within corresponds to a mental form, to a pole, to a specific viewpoint, to a desire and, therefore, to a distinct "I." As a matter of logic, when we dissolve a desire, its corresponding unconscious self-sabotaging beliefs dissolve along with it. That is how we transcend Murphy's Law.

The Law of Attraction holds that if we become deeply convinced of something, it becomes reality. Well then, "becoming deeply convinced of something" means convincing the unconscious, overcoming resistances and skepticisms that we have but whose existence is unknown to us. That is how witchcraft and the magical rites of good and evil work. The laws of universal magnetism govern the attraction between male and female and all the other existing forms of attraction.

Three virtues

To deal properly with women we need: the patience of Job, ice water in our veins, and nerves of steel. And they, what virtues do they need to deal with us?

2. Accepting and getting around the barriers

Barriers to approach combined with inviting behaviors constitute the ambiguity or incoherence in female behavior that torments us so much. It is more advisable to look for alternative paths (openings in the armor) than to try to push against the resistances imposed. Let us ally ourselves with the resistances, agreeing with them and reinforcing them, while at the same time we slip in through openings not visible at first sight. In this way we will obtain good results.

The attitude of accepting the unpleasant side of women, while also handing back to them all the undesirable consequences of this side, can pull them out of the behavioral neoteny that drives them to throw onto our backs blame and responsibilities that do not belong to us. In other words: through a correct psychological state, we corner them so that they either grow up or suffer the bad consequences of their own sly tricks, leaving them no way out other than to act like an adult. Playing with other people's feelings is a childish irresponsibility, typical of idle people.

Let us not force definitions: let us take advantage of the openings offered by the favorable signals contained in ambiguous behavior. Let us choose the correct forms of insinuation. Let us avoid qualitatively wrong insinuations. Qualitatively wrong insinuations provoke explosions.

3. The game of blockages and hopes

At the same time as she shows herself attractive, receptive, and friendly, in order to awaken desire in the man and preserve his hopes, the sly one imposes difficulties and obstacles to his approach. She creates an ambiguous and incomprehensible situation. It seems that she wants something, but it also seems that she wants nothing. In the end, the man himself ends up believing that all the interest and initiative came from him alone and that, on the woman's part, there was no participation whatsoever. When the manipulation is skillfully executed, it always ends up looking as though he wants it and she does not. Then, omitting her own participation, the sly one tells everyone: "Ugh! This annoying guy just won't get off my back!"

It is a problem with two poles. On one side are the attractive behaviors that create, allow, and preserve our hopes and, on the other, the resistant behaviors that block and prevent our approach. How can it be solved?

One possible path is for us to be even more absurd and illogical, insisting in the direction in which the woman least expects us to. What direction is that? The direction of the negative pole. It is a surprising insistence because most men insist on the opposite pole. Let us look at this more closely.

Instead of insisting that the woman give in and pressuring her to say that she feels attracted, filling her with questions, arguing, etc., it is more advisable, in order to wrest a definition from her, to insist in the opposite direction, asking her to confirm that the blockages and resistances really correspond to her true interest ("Are you sure you only want to be my friend?", "Are you really sure you don't want to meet up with me?"). As a rule, the man tries to apply pressure in order to obtain the desirable confirmations that interest him, and not the uninteresting, dreaded, and undesirable confirmations. And here lies our mistake: we fear that the sly one will confirm exactly what we do not want.

If, instead of "pointing a pistol" in order to obtain what we desire (the date, sex), we insist in the opposite direction, seeking confirmation of what we do not want (the absence of the date), we will disconcert the sly one and corner her in the game. If she confirms the worst, she will have revealed the fact she had tried to hide: that she only wanted to use us to satisfy her selfishness. If she confirms the best, she will also have revealed what she had, likewise, tried to hide: that in truth she felt attraction or interest but did not want to admit it. In both cases, the sly one will have no way out and will be defeated in the little game. In these games (true wars!) of passion, the female tactic consists in hiding the truth about what is most important and central to our decision-making. Such strategic information is kept secret at all costs, and there is no use trying to wrest it from them by a direct and explicit route because, the more we insist along this route, the more they close up, block, and create a hell. The best thing, therefore, is to "strike them on the flanks," that is, to attack the problem where they least expect it.

This tactical line really dismantles the little game because it operates on the psychological fields in which the woman is not prepared and in which she tries to avoid measuring inner strength with us. They are prepared for the insistence of the ignorant, who apply pressure in order to confirm male hopes and desires, but they are not prepared for the wise, who reaffirm and reinforce the female resistances themselves. The sly one does not know what to do when her stubborn blockages are accepted, reinforced, and reaffirmed by the man.

4. Man is not the only one to blame for desiring

Man, as a rule, does not have the power to control his desire. When sexually provoked, he is struck down by sexual passion.

There is no option to choose: he must desire or desire. He will not be able to stop desiring. Even if his desire cannot be satisfied and he resigns himself to the suffering of dissatisfaction, this suffering is the result of the inevitable desire. As Schopenhauer observed, we do not have the free will to desire or not. The male is condemned to desire the female who provokes him, at least within the sphere of ordinary existence. The exceptions would be those who have transcended animal instinctive conditioning through spiritual disciplines, those who present certain specific biological differences, and also the cases in which the woman is exceedingly counter-attractive. But exceptions do not invalidate a rule.

Therefore, the blame for a man desiring a woman cannot be imputed to him alone. There is a female share of the blame, because the woman who does not want to be desired does not make herself attractive. The woman who makes herself attractive does so because she wants to be desired. To make oneself attractive is to provoke desire.

It is contradictory for a person to provoke another's desire and, upon being desired, to try to harm the one who desires her with protests and accusations. If we must forbid men to desire women, we must also, as a matter of justice, forbid women to make themselves attractive to men (which is what is done, coherently, in Islam). Or else, on the contrary, we would have to allow both things.

It is common for the man himself to believe that he is solely responsible (guilty!) for desiring a woman. There are cases in which the sly one, acting as the activator and facilitator of male desires, manipulates the appearance of situations so that, at first sight, everything looks as though there is no collaboration whatsoever on her part in the origin of the male interest. The dissimulated psychological manipulation reaches such a high degree of sophistication that, very often, even the interested man himself firmly believes that the woman has not the slightest participation in the process. This manipulative sophistication of the psyche is so efficient that, for a long time, it confused and deceived many psychologists and philosophers. Even so, it seems to me (it only seems to me!) that it is a manipulation carried out unconsciously, that is, something known not by the head but, to paraphrase Schopenhauer, "by instinct."

It would still remain to point out what man's share of responsibility in the origin of his own desire would be. I will point it out: man's responsibility consists in remaining passive before his animal nature, in resigning himself to it instead of trying to overcome it. However, we can never forget that the mating instinct of the human male is so violent that many prefer to pay with their lives the price of sexual union with females who fully satisfy them (the most attractive of all) rather than have to live in continual dissatisfaction[6]. In other words, overcoming the instinct is something very difficult, given the violence with which it acts upon the psyche.

5. Violent behavior and disillusionment

Leaving aside cases of pure and simple gratuitous violence, cases of violence against women are linked to the ambiguous female stance in the relationship, which leads the man to feel cheated in love, and also to the idealization of the feminine. That being so, in order to reduce it, it is necessary to teach boys not to idolize women and to teach girls that, as adults, they must act coherently toward the opposite sex.

[6] Not a few men risk their lives to hold in their arms women who correspond as perfectly as possible to an idealized profile. Some expose themselves to being murdered by jealous rivals, others take up dangerous occupations to obtain wealth, etc., all to attract the most desirable women. Deep down, it is the reproductive instinct that speaks loudest and, in some cases, it even overrides the instinct of self-preservation. In many animal species it is common for males to die in the attempt to mate.

Those who live in the lie do not believe that women are human beings, but rather sublime angelic beings, wonderful, faithful, and devoid of defects. These unfortunate men imagine themselves to be the sole objects of their partners' love and sexual interest, which is evidently false and absurd. When they finally come face to face with reality, many cannot bear it and may suffer an extremely dangerous psychotic break. That is why the idealization of the feminine is an evil. If we do not idolize a woman, we will not demand from her the perfection of goddesses. Then there will be no falling in love, which is nothing more than a neurotic feeling, a sick obsessive-compulsive disorder. Amorous obsession is inseparable from violent behavior because both are the two faces of one and the same coin, namely love and hate. The love-hate dyad forms a pair of opposites, and between its extremes oscillate affectionate attitudes and aggressive attitudes. The more in love a man is, the greater his disappointment will be when he is rejected, abandoned, or discovers that the object of his adoration never matched his divine expectations. True love is calm, sober, has nothing to do with the passionate madness with which it is usually confused, and much more closely resembles friendship.

Instead of living in the lie and relating to women idealized in our dreams, it is much healthier to be able to see the real woman and to relate to reality. And the reality is this: the human being is wicked, treacherous, cruel, and selfish. If women were only wells of virtue or angels devoid of instincts, they would not be human. That is why we must be prepared for everything, never being surprised by cheating, wiles, manipulations, lies, abandonment, frustrations, betrayals, and dissimulations.

Although deep down they are one and the same thing, human wickedness and destructiveness express themselves differently in men and women. Some forms of expression of wickedness are typically female and others are male.

Besides the dark side, there is also another side in human beings of both sexes: a luminous side, from which acts of kindness, mercy, and altruism come. It is from this side that true love comes, which sporadically bursts forth in our nature.

Violent behavior originates, therefore, in the dark side (the "shadow" mentioned by Jung) and can be activated by abrupt and sudden disillusionment. That is why it is important to teach boys self-control and moderation in love. If boys grew up accepting real women, they would not nurture false expectations.

The psychotic breaks of "battered man syndrome"[7] will continue and persist as long as their emotional causes are not adequately considered and as long as the evident fact is neglected that men are human beings (or humanoids, as I usually say, since we are simultaneously human and animal) whose feelings should not be an object of disregard or of jokes.

Although society tells us, full-time, that we must be "sensitive" and sentimental, what it really demands of us is insensitivity in every field, above all in love. The modern directions taken by romantic relationships are driving men ever crazier, and the only way for them to protect themselves is by transcending romantic love through understanding.

The more deluded and in love a man is, the more frustrated he will be on seeing himself rejected during the inevitable behavioral alternation of the object of his adoration. The violence of the reaction will be proportional to the intensity of the supposed love into which he was induced by behaviors that gave free rein to illusion. Deep fascinations bring about intense suffering in love and, in this sense, love is evil.

It is contradictory for society to teach boys the idolatry of the feminine, the cult of romantic love, and to try to punish the men who lose their minds on discovering that their women are not the goddesses they were taught to believe in, but merely defective human beings, just as they themselves are.

[7] That is, the "syndrome of the mistreated man."

Men would not demand divine attributes from women, among them monogamous fidelity, if they were not taught that women are goddesses. The cult of romantic love is an evil, a true brain-washing, which aims at the social control of the male, that so hated and feared being, but which sometimes has the opposite effect.

When men are taught to see women as they are, without mystifications of any kind, without idealizations, without utopias, without romanticisms, without dreams, without madness, they will stop demanding what does not exist and pressing for the impossible. They will not demand perfection and will not try to force women to be angels or goddesses.

A man's madness is directly proportional to his romanticism: the more romantic, the more insane. It would be beneficial to public health to educate men so that they do not nurture unrealistic expectations regarding women.

Even if a man seems cold in daily life, his violent behavior will be essentially passionate. Passionate behavior is bipolar and unites contrary emotions. Frustrated love turns into hatred. Unsatisfied desire causes suffering.

Dissatisfaction and frustration can trigger violent behaviors. The more in love one is, the more one suffers. To teach people that they should let themselves be taken over by amorous passions is to form uncontrolled and violent beings. Loss of emotional control in a romantic relationship results from falling in love.

Ambiguous and indefinite female behavior gives rise to suffering and loss of emotional control in the man, and it too contributes to violence. Therefore, one part of the blame belongs to the man and another part belongs to the woman. Men must learn to control their anger, and women must learn to control their impulses of provocation and emotional aggression.

Possible solutions for minimizing the breaks of "battered man syndrome" would be: 1) absolutely coherent, logical, clear, undissembling, and predictable[8] behavior on the woman's part; 2) an education that freed man from passion and did not feed illusions about the feminine.

If all men freed themselves from passion, women would have no violence to protest against.

Male violence would diminish considerably if:

1) men fought against their passionate impulses;

2) boys were taught not to idealize romantic love or women;

3) bad men were converted into good men;

4) women stopped feeling attracted to cads and stopped rewarding them;

5) women did not allow men to nurture illusory expectations, telling them the truth as soon as they met them;

6) women acted in a coherent and definite way toward men.

Each gender should do its part.

The outbursts of violence of men in love are linked to affective dependence on a single woman. They come from a transference of the maternal parental imago onto the partner.

There are two types of male violence: that of the cads and that of men in love. Women reinforce the first when they reward the bad ones, and the second when they delude the good ones or when they simply and comfortably accept that these men delude themselves. The second is, obviously, more dangerous than the first because it is not a matter of bad character but of madness.

[8] Trust is based on predictability. There is no way to trust an unpredictable person. Unpredictability demands constant alertness.

I am dealing here mainly with psychotic outbursts of violence and not with violence arising from pure and simple bad character, cold and calculating. Let the violent acts of cads and shameless men be excluded, therefore, from the center of this analysis. In this text I have concerned myself with the outbursts of men in love.

6. Ambiguous behavior

Contradictory signals, openings combined with blockages, characterize behavioral ambiguity. Let us take advantage of the openings without being excessively daring. Let us take risks, combining prudence and daring.

Behavioral ambiguity allows situations to be manipulated so as to create the appearance that only we are interested (apparent one-sidedness of interest), but not they.

Let us act implicitly, accepting the ambiguities as they are ("with a certain dose of hypocrisy, as if we were not thinking about it...," Eliphas Lévi would say). Let us hand back the denial of intentions and the ambiguous behavior. Let us advance without owning up to our intentions (isn't that what they do to us?), while we take a general reading of the reactions, preserving masculine severity.

In homeopathic doses, expectations are created in us, fed, and frustrated. Hopes are cultivated at the same time as blockages and impediments are set up.

Ambiguity combines attractions and blockages.

Attractions = friendliness, smiles, inviting glances, provocative clothing, going along with our outward displays of interest, absence of attitudes that clearly indicate disinterest to us and, in general, all favorable communication transmitted through body language.

Blockages = resistances, excuses, and justifications for postponements and refusals.

Dismantling ambiguity = reinforcing the blockages and asking that they be made explicit, while accepting and taking advantage of the attractions as far as possible.

Ambiguous behavior is due to an exaggerated desire for continuity combined with disinterest, in varying degrees, in us as persons. The elusive distancing will be greater or lesser according to the certainties we communicate about our desires, and it may even, in cases where we transmit absolute certainty of being in love, reach the extreme of complete and even permanent distancing. The reason is the unconscious beliefs that we will always be waiting for them and chasing them like fools.

Additional reasons for the two-faced behavior may also be: an interest in testing her own power of seduction, an interest in our prominence or wealth (if any), aversion mixed with greed. Ulterior motives (the “gold digger”) are usually present and originate in the mixture of greed and aversion, which leads them to try to get rid of what is undesirable while retaining what is desirable. The desire for continuity sets in motion the inducement of pursuit, which has as its results and goals: informing them of how desirable they are, confusing us (paralyzing our action while our desire is preserved), inducing us to fall in love and, finally, imprisoning us emotionally so that we will make commitments.

Let us act at their pace, accepting and encouraging the positive and desirable side of incoherent behaviors. Let us be patient. If we take advantage of the little good that is offered to us, we can gradually reverse the ambiguity and invert our position in the relationship, generating gradually greater interest. To do so, we must take advantage of the existing openings (points where they are not armored) to insinuate impressionism and even make an impact. Let us take advantage of the favorable and inviting aspects, insinuating impressionism as far as we can reach, and let us ignore the unfavorable ones.

7. Family decline

Selection criteria

Nowadays, the criteria for choosing husbands tend to be usefulness, convenience, pragmatism, salary, docility, fondness for children, companionship. The "good guys"—sincere, hardworking, and honest—fit this criterion.

The criteria for choosing lovers are sexual attraction and emotional impact. Those of bad character fit this criterion, including those with the traits of Jonason and Schmitt's "Dark Triad."

Therefore, husbands are generally not chosen for the degree of excitement and passion they arouse in their wives, unlike lovers. That is why they are left with the worst and most uninteresting part: obligations, work, expenses, worries, and commitments, among them the commitment to fidelity, besides sexual dissatisfaction. It is also for the same reason that their wives feel no great sexual attraction or passion for them, since they did not choose them for sex but only to help them through difficulties, while the lovers, on the other hand, make their knees go weak. That is what marriage has been turned into!

Exceptions do not invalidate this widespread tendency. Marriage, in the form it takes today, has lost its meaning and brings no advantage whatsoever to the man. That is why I am a defender of the perfect matrimony and condemn the ridiculous caricatures of matrimony that modern unions have turned into. In today's unions, adultery is the rule and not an exception.

The family of the future

According to the values currently imposed by the mass media and by the governments of Western countries, the ideal husband must be a resigned and happy cuckold (the much-touted "understanding husband"), the ideal wife must be an adulteress (they call this "women's sexual freedom"), and the children must be induced from childhood to invert their natural gender identities. Those who rebel against these values are labeled prejudiced and oppressors, if not criminals. From there to the creation of repressive laws that force the adoption of these behaviors there is only one step.

The shamelessness of some

There are women so shameless that they voluntarily marry one man and remain in love with another, even having the gall to demand fidelity and monogamy from the unfortunate husband, who will live through the hell of not feeling loved for an entire lifetime.

8. Generating attraction

To produce positive results, provoking admiration, impact and, consequently, attraction, our prominence should preferably occur in the circles where the female presence is strong.

Attraction arises from our standing out positively in relation to other men, before whom we "show up more," and it brings together multiple combined factors. They always compare us.

Intense feelings are provoked by the following paths: decisive speech, with an unerring aim and topics that are not repetitive; behavioral alternation; good-quality wild sex with great intensity;

fearless and fair unmaskings; prominence in the male hierarchy; a penetrating gaze; confrontation of convictions; severity; confidence; masculinity; coldness; calm; objectivity; ease; mastery of oneself and of situations; leadership; protective command; skill at dismantling; initiative; activity; penetrating intelligence; virility[9].

One does not provoke fear in the enemy when one fears him. One does not provoke anger in the scoffer when one is enraged. Similarly, one does not make a woman fall in love when one is in love. In social relations, feelings complement each other by opposition: what I feel for the other is, in some way, the opposite of what the other will feel for me. It is a matter of logic. Cads provoke in women intense feelings of surrender and devotion. Human passions follow the principles of universal magnetism.

Unfortunately, braggarts, show-offs, liars, and narcissists provoke more emotional impact, and consequently make a greater impression, than the sincere, transparent, humble, and honest. We have to surpass, in the power to impress, those who bear Schmitt's "Dark Triad," but without actually turning into what they are.

Driven by competitiveness and curiosity, defects that tend to swallow them alive, a woman will become specifically interested in a man if she perceives that many other women feel attracted to him. The more beautiful and desirable these rivals are, the more intense the interest will be.

To generate attraction in women is to act in the correct way (which is normally the opposite of what we were taught) and not to try to arbitrarily force their will, an act that strips us of all reason and gives them reasons to spare to accuse us and to manipulate us through our own feelings of guilt. An example of an arbitrary attempt to activate female desire by mistaken paths is the uncontrollable impulse, very common among the uninformed, to show interest, chase, and harass.

[9] It is important to remember that adopting some of these behavioral traits incorrectly, improperly, or in inappropriate contexts is counterproductive and can even be extremely dangerous.

If she does not show herself attracted, it is because the information you (in)voluntarily transmit presents nothing interesting. Change, then, your way of being and acting. Do not persist on the same mistaken path against all the evidence.

9. Meanings of the sexual act

While the female sexual organ is associated with life and birth, the male sexual organ is associated with invasion, pain, penetration, and aggression.

The male sexual act, unlike the female one, is not an act of love or of affection but rather an act of aggression and fury, in a certain sense[10]. It is for this reason, among various others, that the woman is reluctant, selects her partners so carefully, and demands that men hide their true intention, which is to penetrate her, until the moment she decides whether or not she will accept being "attacked" in this way. If she concludes that she will not be able to control the aggressiveness of the act, she will reject the suitor, considering him too impulsive, and will relegate him to the level of the unsatisfied desirers who must wait for her for the rest of their lives. She will not cut the bond definitively, by clarifying things, but will keep him captive without allowing him to satisfy his desire to possess her.

The most curious thing is that, despite being, in a certain sense, an aggression, wild sex can, in some cases, make the woman feel "more female," bind her, and make her dependent[11].

[10] By "fury" understand force applied intensely. What I am asserting is that, because it is an act of penetration, it is not possible to separate it from its invasive and, by extension, aggressive aspect. This "aggression" will be consented to only if the woman feels safe and trusts that the man will not go beyond the permitted limits.

[11] This happens when the aggressiveness is controlled and conducted correctly by the man in a way that does not harm the woman.

The contradiction is explained by the fact that aggressive fury, though feared, makes an impact and transmits virility. At the same time, it can turn into a misfortune if the animal male escapes control. It is a complex problem and difficult to solve.

From this aggressive character derive the preventive social measures against the phallus erectus, including punishments for certain exhibitionist or harassing conduct, as well as the rules that restrict and condition the expression of male sexuality. Exhibitionists cause disgust.

10. Disagreements with seductology

My disagreements with the seductologists (at least with a good many of them) are two: I disagree with their encouragement of promiscuity and with their justifications of female cheating. Their uncritical positions regarding the feminine seem to me a very well disguised kind of "Matrixian conformism." The seductologists show no solidarity with the suffering in love of "beta males" and submit to the typically North American logic of winners and losers. From what I have observed of them, they usually disguise their conformism by feigning superiority to imply that they have no problems with women. Of course this is a big lie, since every heterosexual man has romantic problems with women, including the much-idealized "alpha male." To suppose that a man is definitively exempt from romantic problems because he fits the alpha profile is to suppose that such a profile is miraculous, that it cannot be relativized, and that it cannot be worn down by time. It is, therefore, to suppose an absurdity.

In the texts on seductology that I have read, men are usually assigned all the blame (100%) for their suffering in love and for female wiles, while women are totally exempted, as though they had not the slightest duty to be honest and sincere. My position is that blame and responsibility should hover more or less around 50% for each sex (or 100% for both parties, and not only for one of the parties).

The characteristics that seductology attributes to alpha males and beta males, as regards success in conquering and living with women, are not false (they are, in fact, practically the same ones I point out). However, this does not mean that we must exempt women from criticism, praising all their cheating, nor that we must condemn those who rebel against the passionate despotism exercised over the heart.

We are, therefore, in agreement regarding the male behavioral characteristics that attract and that repel the opposite sex. We are, however, in disagreement regarding the ways this knowledge is used, as well as the ways of valuing female wiles and the male reactions of indignation they arouse. Seductology does not seem to make any effort to rid itself of misandry.

11. A vicious circle

As long as he lacks experience, the innocent man will always fall for the same cheating little games, until the moment he learns to expect them consciously in order to dismantle them before they begin. Not to be frustrated by a promise, it is enough not to believe it. However, as Eliphas Lévi observed, people find it difficult not to believe what they desire. The greater the desire, the greater the credulity.

Excitement over promises or offers (formal or not) that will never be fulfilled, and the disillusionments that follow it, form a vicious circle in which the good and inexperienced man is usually trapped. Moments of joy born of hope are followed by moments of frustration. Some time after the frustration born of the cheating comes forgetting, and then the inexperienced man is ready to be deluded again. Thus suffering in love is prolonged indefinitely. Concrete examples of the vicious circle of frustrations are not lacking: promises of a date, of spectacular sex, and of other wonders are almost never fulfilled.

The solution to this problem is to get used to never believing the promises that might excite us. It may also be of some value to anticipate and, at the moment the promise is made, destroy the wile by revealing our pessimistic (realistic) skepticism. He who never believes cannot be deceived.

12. The infinite postponement

When a sly one shows herself interested, lets you nurture hopes and, at the same time, strings you along indefinitely, postponing dates, inventing flimsy excuses, and putting off the best to infinity, this indicates that she is certain of your interest. She knows that you are chained and will not leave her, so she puts it off and puts it off, stokes your desire and does not satisfy it.

To get out of this horrible situation, we have to hit her correctly in her feelings. How? By striking her in what she fears most. What does she fear most? That you will go to the opposite extreme from where you are, that is, that you will begin to feel aversion and repulsion instead of attraction. This fear is the weak and sensitive spot on which to operate.

How to strike her in this weak spot? By showing how repulsive her attitude is. How to show this? By unmasking her wile at the moment it happens. If, instead of filling her with questions or putting on pressure, you simply let her know that you know exactly what her intentions are and that you are sure the sly one will never meet up with you, then walk away (or hang up the phone, as the case may be), without saying anything more and much less ending the relationship, it is almost certain that you will have hit her right where she did not want to be hit. With the cheating in full swing, you can say something more or less like this:

"I know you're just stringing me along and that you've already decided you're never going out with me!"

In the case of those who repeatedly set up dates by phone only to back out at the last minute, it is enough to ask something more or less like the following, well before she takes the initiative to cancel:

"Are you going to cancel the date when the time gets close?"

Of course there is no single formula for expressing these ideas. These sentences are only suggested models that need to be modified and adapted to the real situation in which events are taking place. What I am saying is that we must take the lead and unmask her in a friendly way before she cancels or postpones. We have to make her realize that we have "guessed" her dissimulated intention, that is, make her feel caught red-handed in the middle of her wile. I should remind you that this is a theoretical reflection with practical applicability and not a cookbook recipe.

Do not pressure, do not fight, do not argue. "Hit" her and walk away, while remaining accessible. If she does not seek you out after a while, make one last attempt. If even so the cheating continues, there will be no more hope: she decidedly loathes you and there is nothing more that can be done. But you will have no more doubts; everything will be resolved. This procedure does not guarantee the conquest of the desired woman, but it is almost totally effective at dismantling the wile in question, dispelling doubts, discovering the true intentions hidden behind contradictory behaviors, and making things resolved from then on, keeping us from wasting our precious time chasing a sly one who will never give us anything[12].

[12] Supposing that, even after proving the woman's total lack of attraction, the man still does not give up, the only alternative left to him is to change his own behavior, making himself as attractive as possible. If even this last and desperate resort fails, then, my friend, give up, because only a hundred million dollars would bring her to you. Even so, she would not be interested in you as a person, but in your money. In any case, fixing one's libido on a

The infinite postponement is a female wile to preserve the man's interest, regardless of how much he may suffer. It is a sadistic procedure that can be dismantled when we suddenly polarize ourselves[13] at the most improbable and unexpected extreme. What matters is to dismantle it masterfully and hand back the contradiction.

Dealing with romantic cheating is like dealing with commercial cheating: we take precautionary measures long before it happens.

In any case, prevention is better than cure. The most advisable thing is to get ahead of the cheating right at the first contact ("Are you one of those women who like to string a guy along forever?"), dismantling it before it begins. Be quicker and abort the wile while it is still gestating.

13. Affective aggression

Besides the power to attack physically, people of both sexes can attack each other psychologically. Among the forms of psychological aggression, we have aggression by means of romantic passion. Its power cannot be neglected, and it is capable of raising stress to extremely high and even lethal levels. It becomes, then, important to know the means of defending ourselves emotionally and of dismantling such aggressions.

I have been writing about the affective aggressions perpetrated by women against men and about the possible means that would allow such aggressions to be dismantled. The reason is that I am a man, and experience is my first source of inspiration.

My hypothesis is that women have a greater ability to instrumentalize love as a weapon, while male aggressions tend to be of woman who rejects us is something sick, since there are millions of women in the world.

---

[13] This polarization must be temporary, because otherwise we lose our unpredictability.

another kind, though no less worrying for that. Let them prove me wrong and I will modify my hypothesis, as well as the ideas that follow from it.

Much of what I have written can be applied in reverse, to women's advantage, but not all of it. A woman can read my texts and learn a great deal about the art of fighting[14] in the war of passion, but she must take care not to attribute to the supposed "stronger sex" only the female tactics of attack, because men often use different tactics. In other words: the tactics of cads, about which I have written almost nothing, are not always the same as those used by the sly ones.

All my reflections must be situated only within the affective, romantic, and passionate sphere of relationships between men and women. I have no political position whatsoever, and I do not believe in politics as a means of liberating man. I can rightly be considered politically "alienated," since I am a stranger to such questions. I am completely disillusioned with politics, and the proposal I make to the reader is to concern himself only with his inner liberation. I believe that the only true freedom is the freedom of the soul, and this is not achieved through social struggles, political reforms, or economic measures. The "isms" have never liberated man from suffering and certainly will not. I consider that we must free ourselves inwardly from all these ties. However, if someone wants to campaign for some cause, well... that is not my problem.

As far as possible, we must free ourselves inwardly, not only from the affective oppression caused by the opposite sex, but also from the emotional oppression that all the things of life exert on [14] The fight is completely inward. He who conquers himself wins the war of passion. It is a peaceful fight, in which we boycott insincerity through abstention, adapt ourselves to difficulties, and dismantle and unmask cheating and wiles by means of strategic skills. None of this would be possible without the proper inner condition.

our heart. Negative emotions cause great damage to our physical and mental health, harming the quality of our life.

Because it lies at the essence of the affective aggression I discuss, I understand romantic passion to be an evil in an idyllic and wonderful disguise. My view is that it is an obsessive-compulsive disorder incessantly worshipped in our society, to the detriment of all. There is an immense distance between true love and romantic love. The first is a stance resulting from the will, and the second an emotional and exalted possession resulting from desire. Understand me well: it is not that we must be cold; what we must do is give shelter to sublime emotions within us.

14. On being strategic

People constantly ask about the malleability of my ideas. The reason is that I seek to be strategic. I appreciate the philosophy of Jeet Kune Do and consider behavioral rigidity self-sabotaging. However, it seems to me that most people are disoriented by flexibility because they cannot make out the logical thread that holds its parts together.

Ask any general or specialist in strategy and he will tell you that one can never act in a conditioned way in a war. The stubbornness of always acting the same way, despite facts that show this way to be counterproductive, signals a lack of intelligence and of understanding. Persisting in acts that result in failure is pure stubbornness, and there is a very well-known animal that serves as the symbol of stubbornness...

When it comes to matters of love, stubbornness and conditioning must occupy a central position in our preventive concerns. If we stubbornly insist on always and exclusively acting in a single way, we will not be able to surprise, we will be predictable, the emotional impact of our acts will wear out, we will always fall into the same traps, and we will never learn the lesson. A virtue displaced from its position turns into a defect. If we are hard when we should be kind, we will lose the psychological war. If we are kind when we should be hard, we will lose it just the same. The same goes for any other behavioral characteristic: we must know how to measure it out according to the moment, always ready to switch to the opposite attitude.

To be strategic is to be able to find the most efficient path to reach a given end. Whoever adopts fixed attitudes is not strategic. Whoever is not strategic knows neither how to measure out nor how to alternate his action, and becomes a plaything in the hands of sly ones experienced in toying with other people's feelings.

Obviously, the male profile I have postulated in my books as ideal has certain fundamental traits, but there are situations in which we must deviate from them to a greater or lesser degree, according to the need and the moment at hand.

15. Some types of women who do not deserve trust

It is worth cataloging some types of sly ones who like to cheat in love. We have to guard against them, always staying ready to dismantle their wiles. Let us look at some types:

1. The woman who gives you her phone number but does not answer when you call, or has someone say she is not in;

2. The woman who asks for your phone number but does not call you;

3. The one who likes to flirt with other guys but does not tell you so right at the beginning of the relationship, letting you believe that she has a monogamous vocation and only has eyes for you;

4. The one who likes to "give the time of day" to harassers;

5. The one who wants to receive love but does not want to give it;

6. The one who suddenly disappears from your life, exactly when you are liking her the most;

7. The one who spends all your money;

8. The one who wants to turn you into a slave;

9. The one who abuses the good faith of sincere men;

10. The one who reacts to affection with contempt;

11. The one who adopts ambiguous, incoherent, and indefinite behaviors;

12. The one who labels as “insecure” or “jealous” the men who demand transparency and coherence of attitudes;

13. The one who demands commitment and trust from her partner but behaves in a dubious way;

14. The one who pretends to be interested in you in order to repel you when you try to approach;

15. The one who shows herself attractive and receptive in order to make false accusations of sexual harassment;

16. The one who enjoys watching males fight it out over her;

17. The one who, out of pure spite, goes against all her partner’s wishes;

18. The woman who provokes your irritation to see you furious, calls the police, and tries to get you to hit her before the police arrive.

There are many other types that I do not remember right now, but these I have pointed out will serve for you to begin reflecting. Prevention is better than cure: before we fall into the traps of these sly ones, we must get ahead of them and take prophylactic measures for protection. A preventive measure that usually works is to confront them right off the bat, firing point-blank questions about their sentimental honesty and in this way obtaining guarantees of sincerity. This inhibits the cheating somewhat (but not entirely), since they realize they are not dealing with an idiot. A second measure is to observe them and adapt ourselves to their behaviors, avoiding believing what they say. A third (and practically infallible) preventive measure is to avoid them for good, preferring only women who are sincere, coherent, transparent, and who act in a definite way in love. But it is not easy to find women like that these days...

16. Male self-power

It is one thing to master oneself. It is another thing to dominate the other. He who masters himself is highly adaptable, and ends up leading the other through the other's own desires and passions, without forcing his will or his free will. Because he accepts and adapts, he is able to follow, without identification, the course of other people's passions.

There are men who let themselves be taken over by the desire that women do what they want. They are possessed by a passion: their will is imprisoned in this desire. If they do not eliminate this weakness, they may be led and manipulated all over the place: women will pretend to go along with them and will drag them wherever they please. It is important, for this reason, to renounce the desire to force them to fit the idealized molds we create. We have to destroy such molds in order to adapt ourselves to what [15] The strategies of "mental cornering" and of the "ultimatum" aim to reveal reality so that we can adapt. They do not aim to force the other's free will. Nor would they aim to force the woman to love us, because that would simply be impossible.

they really are, to what they actually present and offer us[15]. This is not submission but adaptation.

Male self-power should be understood thus: man's power exercised over himself. Man must be master of his own feelings. Women's frustration of male expectations is possible, in part, because men let themselves be dominated by the desire that women do what they want. This is the main expectation that suffers frustration. To dismantle the process, it is enough to have no expectation whatsoever. How? Through the death of the defects.

To accept everything, to adapt, and to take advantage of whatever is possible for as long as it is possible: that is my suggestion. Not to waste time punching the knife, stupidly fighting it out against the inevitable. The reader will ask me whether there is a limit. I will say: the limit is the damage caused to our life. A woman has every right to do whatever she wants with her own life, but not with ours. The limit is abuse of our person. Got it?

The reason some women detest what I write is that I suggest to man psychological rebelliousness in his relationship with the opposite sex. I suggest that man stop being affectively submissive and seek emotional independence. Many women do not accept this because they want to keep men under their feet.

17. Why they are so fascinating

What makes women so attractive in men's eyes is femininity. And what is femininity? In my way of thinking, it is fragility, delicacy, and sweetness. It is these characteristics that make a woman more feminine, and the more feminine a woman is, the more attractive she will be. The woman who wants to be attractive in male eyes shows herself feminine in every respect, as far as she is able. Conversely, the woman who does not want to activate men's sexual desire shows herself similar to them. Of course men will then repel her, since she gives them the same sense of strangeness given them by other men. From the point of view of sexual affinity, the male is strongly attracted to what is opposite to him as a gender and repels what is similar to him.

Women are imbued with the universal feminine. When they enter our field of perception, their unpleasant characteristics and defects are excluded from our consciousness, outshone by the archetypal feminine traits. In other words: we see only the adorable femininity and become blind to everything else. Because it is so wonderful and paradisiacal, the feminine masks the uninteresting side, which they also bear. However, this idyll is a fantasy and is very far from the real woman. She is rarely perceived. When the fantasy is suddenly undone, against our will, it can turn into the opposite fantasy: that woman is a terrible being with immense powers. Both fantasies are mistaken, because their power is conferred by our own psyche. It is within us, therefore, that the problem lies.

The feminine is a force of nature and not something exclusive to women, as everyone thinks. Everything in nature develops according to polarities. Long before women existed on Earth, the feminine already existed. The feminine is eternal and universal.

18. On the levels of approach

I will now try to make up for an important aspect that I believe I neglected in the books.

The strategic principles developed in my texts have sometimes appeared contradictory and, from what I have been observing, have left some readers confused. This is because the texts lacked further clarification regarding the levels of approach at which each of the “war tactics” is functional. I will try to go deeper into this point and solve this problem.

First of all, it is worth remembering that, because female behavior is non-logical, contradiction is inherent to the war of passion, and that the tactics, for this reason, must be equally contradictory, opposed, and antagonistic among themselves.

A tactic that is highly effective at one level may be useless or harmful at another. Let us take a closer look.

In the terrain of romantic dealings with women, I have been able to confirm the existence of the following levels, in increasing order of intimacy:

1. First level: she does not notice your existence;

2. Second level: contact is established;

3. Third level: your intention is made explicit;

4. Fourth level: intimate physical contact is achieved.

At the first level, you do not exist for her. You are just one more in the crowd of idiots and doormats of the world. It is at this level, in order to get out of this humiliating insignificance, that we adopt the procedures of pretending not to notice her presence, being attentive to her rivals, approaching without looking at her (so that she cannot help knowing we are there), avoiding staring at necklines and legs, feigning indifference, suddenly looking her right in the eyes with a certain "tough-guy face" and not looking away[16], adopting actions of specific isolation, and things like that. At this level, the following blunders are fatal: monkeying around to attract attention, giving friendly little smiles, rushing to be helpful[17], lying down in the mud so that she can walk over us, putting on a nice-guy face, doing handstands, showing off on top of pedestals, and similar things. If you do the right things and avoid the wrong things, you will probably move, little by little, to [16] Don't worry: if everything has been done correctly, she will not run away in fear of you, because she will believe she can control you as she always has with all the others.

[17] Except when there is a real need to help or rescue her, for then it will be an excellent opportunity to get out of this first level, or when an opening for contact is being offered to us, for then we will already have left this level.

the next level, because your existence will finally be noticed. The "tough-guy technique" (the man who pays no attention) belongs to this level.

At the second level, you do something or take advantage of some opportunity to strike up contact. This is the level at which you are already in a position to talk with her. You will only enter this level if you put yourself forward (CORRECTLY!) for contact. If you sulk, you will remain at the first level for centuries, until you learn to enter the next phase. There is no use thinking she will push you into this level. That will never happen and, if it does, you can be sure something is wrong. Here some torments begin but, since there is still no shared everyday life, they are very incipient. Our intention to make contact may be scorned or rejected; the woman may pull faces, be curt, cold, unfriendly, or something like that. In short: she may create a barrier. That is why the best thing is always to have a good reason to justify the approach, implying that we are not being moved by a specific interest in her. Specific interest in the woman need not show through (since they always assume it anyway) and should even be hidden. She must believe precisely the opposite: that there is no specific interest in her, that the contact is being sought out of necessity, for other reasons. If the barrier still persists, there will be no remedy but to strike up contact by hitting her in her feelings with calculated attitudes that displease her (such as, for example, confronting her convictions and her tastes). Once we are completely inside this level, the self-mastery that is outwardly expressed as mastery of the relationship is demanded of us more and more, especially if we have got in by means of displeasure. Fatal blunders that we usually commit here are: acting in a way that betrays that we are mad with passion and desire, becoming fascinated, letting ourselves be dragged into conflicts and fights, speaking meekly, becoming effeminate in our manners in the vain hope of winning her sympathy, feigning goodness, being clingy, phoning nonstop, chasing, harassing, prolonging conversations until the woman gets tired and ends the dialogue and, in general, everything that shows that we give her a great deal of importance, positive or negative. We advance through this phase letting it show that we are available but not specifically interested, taking advantage of the openings, behaving in a highly masculine way, leading the conversations, guiding, helping, and protecting, always without paying her much attention and hiding our interest. A good way to advance is to make noncommittal invitations. If you lay your desire wide open, you will satisfy the sly one's instinct for continuity and she will run away from you, happy as can be. So you must hide it while the contact grows closer, attraction arises, and intimacy is gradually established. In a very subtle way, the effort to provoke romantic enchantment can be begun here and deepened in the next stage.

The third level is the one at which we no longer need to pretend that we have no penis as far as the woman we desire is concerned[18], that is, the one at which we make it clear that we are males wanting to mate and that we are not content to be the sly one's mere "friends." It is here that we begin to face the torment of ambiguous behavior. Most of the torments and manipulative wiles I described in the books belong to this phase and the next, since in the earlier ones there was not enough contact for them to be functional. It is here that we adopt the "ultimatum" and the "cornering," if we have the courage to face the worst, or else we simply accept the indefiniteness so as to take advantage of whatever is possible, while we try to activate her attraction. Anticipating frustrations, amicably forcing definitions in unforeseen directions, and unmasking dissimulated female intentions can also be useful at this stage. Common male mistakes are: pressing in a predictable way (toward what we desire), creating expectations, feeding hopes, trying to force the woman to fit idealized molds, wanting her to be as we would like, getting into a stubborn "tug-of-war," wanting to win the little games, wanting her to humble herself, to show affection, to demonstrate that we are important, etc. In this phase the man tends to lose his behavioral malleability and his capacity for alternation, fixing himself on lines of action that make him predictable and incapable of surprising.

[18] To be clearer: we no longer need to pretend, as in earlier phases, that our penis is not "pointed" at her.

The fourth level is the one at which we finally reach the goal: she is in our arms and we have won a stable relationship with a woman who truly pleases us! That is what really matters! In order not to slip back to the earlier levels, one must combine the following: intense sex, self-mastery, detachment, and protective leadership. In this phase the female instinct to dominate the male shows itself in all its force. She will test you, at intervals, for as long as the relationship lasts. Here irritating provocations, hysterical fits, attempts to provoke jealousy, and various kinds of cheating and lies usually occur. Mistakes normally made by men at this stage are: taking female behavior seriously, becoming enraged, shouting, taking revenge, letting oneself be carried away by anger instead of skillfully dismantling such hells, believing that one's partner is the best on Earth, going around in vicious circles, always falling into the same traps, identifying with situations instead of staying above them, etc.

In some cases, we can go through all four levels with extreme speed. In others, it takes us a long time. We may also remain stuck at any level for an indefinite time or even slip back from the last to the first, which happens when couples separate and forget each other forever.

19. On enchantment

This is a "tactical" aspect that I neglected. It belongs mainly to the third level, but it should also be adopted sporadically in the fourth.

It so happens that not everything in a relationship is war. We must know how to combine opposites. To the defensive acts of dismantling we have to add the act of romantic enchantment, in suitable doses and at the right moments. Yes, there are moments when we need to tell them, without exaggeration, how much we like them. What are the right moments to say this? Although they are rare, they are those in which they act like real women and not like brats. There are also moments when we have to tighten the bond of sympathy with attitudes that show a moderate affection, and even pretend that we are in love (as they do with us).

The voice is the best tool for enchantment. According to Eliphas Lévi, there is no instrument more enchanting than the human voice. Certain romantic tones of voice combined with the right words can have a very interesting effect when used at the right moment. The magnetism of the astral light flows mainly through the eyes, the mouth (and this includes the voice), the hands, and the sexual organs. That is why enchantment at the second and third levels depends on the way of looking and speaking. And that is also why enchantment at the fourth level depends on the tightening of physical intimacy. If you polarize yourself in coldness and never use these tools, you will achieve nothing.

20. On the revolt against reality

He who awakens from the illusion and “leaves the matrix,” as my readers say, must take care not to let himself be overtaken by negative feelings such as anger, sadness, and others.

When we realize that women are not the angels we believed them to be and that they too possess the sinister side of human nature pointed out by Machiavelli and by Freud, we can fall into undesirable inner states. Such states are harmful and increase our emotional and romantic problems instead of diminishing them. On realizing that woman cheats, plays games, does not give up dominance, manipulates, and wants to own his heart, the newly freed ex-Matrixian must take care not to let himself be swallowed up by revolt. Rebelliousness and indignation are just and even necessary, but revolt (anger) is harmful, unstrategic, and counterproductive.

In the war of passion, the capacity to accept raw reality, just as it presents itself, is an indispensable requirement for being able to act upon it realistically, taking advantage of it or modifying it as far as possible. The man in revolt does not accept reality; he struggles against the inevitable and beats his fists against knife points, showing a lack of understanding.

Any strategist knows very well that, to win a war, coldness and realism are necessary. The impulsive make blunders, put their foot in it, fall like ducks into traps, and are easily victimized by wiles.

I understand that, in the war of passion, the goal of the sensible man is not to win the loved/desired woman at all costs, nor to force her to fit idealized molds or to conform, against her own will, to our desires, but rather to achieve resolved inner states. That is what matters: to resolve our feelings and to win inner peace.

21. Passionate love and lust

They say that passion is something beautiful and that it does us a great deal of good. Lust is encouraged everywhere. Everywhere one hears, as Alberoni observed:

"Seduce everyone."

This is a disease of our civilization: the cult of lust and of sentimentalism. People go so far as to believe that sentimentalism is the most sublime spirituality, without heeding the fact that there are horrible and destructive feelings that alternate, in bipolar succession, with “benevolent” passionalism.

Romantic passion is felt in the heart. The lustful impulse is felt in the sexual organ. Nevertheless, both have a mental origin; they are in the head. They are grounded in mental forms, thoughts, memories, morbid and romantic mechanical imaginings. That is why philosophical reflection frees man and teaches him how to live: lust and romantic passionalism are in the mind, and it is from there that they must first be uprooted. They are mistaken visions, distorted understandings, subjective and erroneous perceptions. He who tries to overcome his weaknesses without cleansing his mind will get worse and worse and will fall ever deeper. The way is to understand reality, and this is achieved first of all through educating the mind for correct, silent, and concentrated thinking. Only this kind of thinking makes possible the self-analysis, self-reflection, and self-observation taught by Erich Fromm.

The silent mind gives no shelter to the despotism of bestial mental forms. The more one thinks, the worse one makes the situation. On the other hand, concentrated thought leads, over time, to not-thinking and to pure understanding.

The man in love thinks of his beloved constantly. The lustful man thinks of the woman he desires without stopping. Their minds are, in a certain sense, obsessed. Therefore, if you want to overcome your affective and sexual weaknesses, you must begin by taming and educating your mind.

Both romantic passion and the lustful impulse can invade the mind. Obsessed[19], the individual no longer has control over himself and is not the master of his own acts. The non-satisfaction

[19] I am not using this word to designate people who have definitively lost control of themselves, for in such a case every attempt at self-overcoming is impossible. I am referring to cases in which there is still enough lucidity to drive the person to fight against the despotism of destructive inner impulses.

of the obsessing impulse causes suffering, and this pain drives the person toward satisfaction. To overcome this suffering, the obsessed person must separate himself from the invading impulse, observing it "from outside," as something foreign, regarding it as a stranger (another "I" within himself)[20]. With his observation he must penetrate, first of all, his mind (his thoughts, imaginings, fantasies, memories, reasonings, and recollections). It is mainly there, in the mind, that the obsessing and undesirable psychic elements are found. The problem is, therefore and above all, in the head (intellectual center). When we resolve it there, we can easily resolve it in the heart (emotional center) and in the other centers (sexual, instinctive, and motor).

A serious mistake made by the obsessed is trying to stop the impulses without stopping the corresponding thoughts. Such an attempt causes the impulses to assail them with even greater force.

Concentration of thought and control of the mind are also useful in overcoming premature ejaculation, which results from mental overexcitement caused by unsatisfied erotic fantasies that invade the head during the sexual act, and in eliminating any other defects of a psychological nature. It is a specific care that one needs to take during the death of the Ego[21].

22. Reinforcing the pillars of the theory

The research of Skyler S. Place

I recently learned of a study, carried out by Skyler Place (Indiana University), which showed that women, during "flirting," behave in such a way as to make it difficult or impossible for men to be certain about any possible interest on their part. I was very [20] Only he who possesses a lucidity that allows him to understand that he has been invaded, and to feel the need for self-overcoming, is capable of such a break with identification.

[21] I suggest that the reader research this subject in the works of V.M. Samael and V.M. Rabolú, especially the one called "Death in Motion."

pleased to learn that yet another experimental study proves what I have been saying for a long time.

Place demonstrated, by means of tests, how difficult it is to read female behavior while a man is approaching a woman, so as to conclude with certainty whether or not she likes the one approaching her. Women who were asked to observe the same behaviors of their peers and give an opinion on them also had difficulties. In short: Place demonstrated that it is difficult for men to know whether or not women are interested in them. The reverse was not found. The difficulty or impossibility for women of reading male behaviors is much smaller.

If female behavior manifests itself in such a way as to prevent the man from drawing conclusions and proves difficult to interpret, this means that it is ambiguous. Place therefore demonstrated the truth of one of the central pillars of my theory: female behavioral ambiguity. From it derives the disconcerting paradoxicality that disorients man's rational judgments by means of illogicality. It is difficult for us to conclude whether or not they want something with us because their behaviors are usually undefined. As I have said, indefiniteness is the fundamental weapon of the female sex in the war of passion. Place understands it as an evolutionary adaptive mechanism for selecting the best males of the species, in complete agreement with my theory in this respect. However, being a scientist, he neither broadens nor deepens the philosophical and moral implications of his finding. Nor does he give men ways of dealing with such difficulties, and he even goes so far as to justify women's use of such a "weapon."

In truth, female behavioral ambiguity is not limited to the level of courtship by the man. It is also present in dating, in marriage, in stable and unstable relationships, and wherever the male's sexual desire and the female's acceptance are at stake. They usually behave in such a way as to confuse us, acting as if they liked and at the same time did not like us, as if they wanted us and at the same time did not want us. Simultaneously they attract and repel; they show themselves open and put up resistance. They send opposite and contradictory signals, which makes them hard to read. They never make things easy; they only stimulate and make things difficult, thus remaining in control of the situation. Examples? There are heaps of them: when she smiles marvelously and casts you meaningful glances, but says you "got it all wrong" when she is approached; when she tells you through tears that she loves you, but does exactly what you hate most; when she says she is faithful, but acts suspiciously; etc.

In the face of ambiguous female behavior, I see two alternatives: 1) accept it and take advantage of everything possible; 2) force the definition in an unexpected direction, that is, accept and encourage the unpleasant pole of the undefined behavior, which is precisely what the sly one does not expect[22]. The second option is only for those who are willing to risk losing the woman.

The research of Jonason and Schmitt

I have already mentioned their research in my book "Masculine Reflections on Woman and Love." Peter Jonason and David Schmitt presented, in Japan, a study showing that women prefer men who carry the Dark Triad (liars, impulsive, and cheats). This study reinforced another pillar of my theory: the attraction to bad men. It is worth getting to know, and I recommend it.

The research of Dario Maestripieri

This study, which also reinforced another pillar of my theories and was carried out by the Universities of Chicago and Santa

[22] Undefined behavior blends two opposite poles, one desirable and the other undesirable to the man. Manipulative women, as a rule, expect the man to insist on satisfying his desire, pressing for a definition in favor of the pleasant pole. However, if the man fights against himself and is able to press in the opposite direction, he will surprise them, striking them emotionally "on their unguarded flanks."

Barbara, showed that women distinguish quickly and accurately, from facial features, men who like children from those who do not, and also distinguish those who have high levels of testosterone from those who do not. According to Maestripieri, one of the authors of the study, the most masculine men are preferred for short-term relationships, while those who like children are chosen for lasting commitments.

There are several interesting implications and possible consequences of this study. If the most masculine specimens are good for short-term relationships, then they are good for sex without commitment, since the man will not accept a sexless relationship. And if the less masculine men who like children are preferred for lasting commitments, this means that they are good for being husbands and companions. In short: they want the latter for the shared life of marriage and the former for sex. The most masculine men get the best part: intense sex and freedom. The less masculine get the worst: worries about children, headaches, and commitments to an unreciprocated fidelity (and here I am reminded once again of Schopenhauer!). In my view, all this is also related to the little sexual attraction that husbands usually exert over their wives. The question then remains: whose children are being raised by the nice guys who like children?

Contraindications

My works should not be read by those who do not have a philosophical profile[23] or who are not used to reasoning carefully and freely. They are completely contraindicated for anyone who lacks a deep capacity for interpretation and does not like to study. Nor do I recommend them to people whose understanding is sick[24].

[23] I am referring to a love of philosophical reflection and not to an academic degree. For me, every human being is a philosopher, provided he appreciates serious reflection.

[24] I am referring to a sick understanding and not to an aching heart. Philosophical reflection can heal the soul, but it demands clarity of understanding. Sentimental illnesses can be cured starting from a healthy understanding.

Such people will inevitably distort them and accommodate them to their defective worldviews, spoiling their messages. I cannot prevent them from approaching my works, but I can do my part by advising against their reading them.

Biased, dogmatic, extremist, violent, fanatical, intolerant people, adherents of one-sided and polarized views, who live for the enjoyment of the lower feelings and have turned stubborn partiality into a religion, are no good for learning or for reflecting on painful and polemical questions, because they do not have the nerves to bear reality without exploding. I have never written for that kind of people, and I want them far away from my texts.

The distorters do not possess the mental prerequisites necessary for understanding the dangerous, thorny, and polemical contents that interest us, for they are incapable of doubting the hegemonic paradigms of this decadent age, in which madness and dementia reign more than ever. To understand these contents, one needs to develop certain specific cognitive skills, among them the power to question one's own convictions and the convictions of one's age, to reason in reverse, to think dialectically, to change one's ideas frequently, to go far beyond appearances and the obvious, and also to build knowledge continuously.

The sincere effort to understand something and not to irresponsibly close careless conclusions based on insufficient data does not depend on a person's schooling but rather on his intellectual honesty. There are simple people who are very discerning when it comes to judging, and there are intellectual scoundrels, sly operators who manipulate information to defend lies. What matters is that we be sincere, rigorous, and careful while we weave our analyses.

Therefore, if you are not willing to devote a large part of your time to perfecting your cognitive faculties, keep away from the study of problematic subjects and do not dare try to follow our reflections, because you will be getting in our way.

I publicly denounce as FALSE and IMPOSTORS any and all persons, communities, or groups, online or not, who, using my name, sell books, give consultations, seek profit, and tolerate: violent language, foul words, extremist postures, fanaticisms, childish postures and language, dogmatisms, and other similar mental vices. All these persons and communities are false and DO NOT REPRESENT ME, for fixed and one-sided mentalities are incompatible with my thought, and I HAVE NO PUBLIC REPRESENTATIVES[25] ANYWHERE AT PRESENT, I DO NOT SEEK TO MAKE PROFITS, I DO NOT SELL BOOKS, AND I DO NOT GIVE CONSULTATIONS.

I take this opportunity to thank the online communities of true readers who study my books and sincerely try to understand them. I have seen that you defend the correct interpretation against the distorters and frauds. I thank and congratulate you! I will not mention the names of these communities and good people because there are many of them and I am afraid of forgetting some...

[25] Although I have used this term in the past, I have now chosen to distinguish the representative from the collaborator, to avoid unpleasant and undue confusion. Sometimes I designate trusted friends, who move about the internet with ease, to publish my texts, books, and messages. They are only volunteer collaborators; they do not charge for their work, they do not answer for my opinions, and they cannot be considered my "official" public representatives, since they are only people who have offered to collaborate by faithfully passing on what I ask of them. Let "representative" be understood as a person authorized to express opinions on behalf of another. It is one thing to express one's own opinions on behalf of another person, and quite another, certainly very different, to faithfully pass on the opinions of an author at the latter's request. So far, I have not delegated the authorship of what I write, and my collaborators must in no way be confused with frauds who, every now and then, try to use another's name for their own benefit. My collaborators are sincere helpers.

Glossary

This glossary was added to the English edition and is not part of the Portuguese original. It lists the author's key concepts that appear in this book, with the original Portuguese term and the English rendering used throughout the translation.

alpha male (macho alfa) — The dominant male of ethology, as used in discussions of attraction.

alternation (alternância) — The deliberate oscillation between coldness and affection, attributed by the author to feminine emotional games and recommended to men, following Lévi, as a way of crossing and alternating one's action.

complexes (complexos) — Used in the psychoanalytic sense; the author treats complexes, egos, and defects as near synonyms.

cornering (encurralamento) — The author's strategy of placing someone before a choice that exposes their real intentions.

Dark Triad (tríade sinistra) — The psychological term for the combination of narcissism, Machiavellianism, and psychopathy. The author cites the research of Jonason and Schmitt to support his claim that women are attracted to men who lie, act impulsively, and cheat.

emotional center (centro emocional) — From Gurdjieff and Samael Aun Weor: the psychic center of feelings, distinct from the intellectual and motor centers. The author holds that a man must master it to stay immune to emotional provocation and manipulation.

enchantment (encantamento) — Fascination produced through pleasure and desire (flattery, seduction, promises).

fascination (fascinação) — The capture of consciousness by an object of desire or aversion; for the author, the same phenomenon as enchantment, bewitchment, and hypnosis.

female (vs. Woman) (fêmea (vs. Mulher)) — The author contrasts the authentic, capitalized Woman with the instinctive "humanoid female animal."

humanoid (humanóide) — The author's term for the ordinary human being: a rational animal driven by instinct and by the ego, which merely has a human appearance and has not yet become an Authentic Man.

levels of approach (níveis de aproximação) — The four stages the author distinguishes in courtship: she does not notice the man, contact is established, his intention is made explicit, and intimate physical contact is achieved. He holds that a tactic that works at one level can be useless or harmful at another.

Matrixian (matrixiano) — The author's coinage, after the film The Matrix, for the man who lives inside the illusions about passion and romance instilled by the media and therefore acts against his own interests with women.

passions (paixões) — In the classical philosophical sense: desires, fears, and attachments that sweep the will along, not only romantic love.

seductology (sedutologia) — The author's name for the study and techniques of seduction, from which he distances himself.

self-defense (legítima defesa) — For the author, the only case in which dismantling another's manipulations, or returning them, is justified.

sentimental selfishness (egoísmo sentimental) — The author's name for the principle that, in the war of passion, only one's own feelings matter. It drives the sly ones to judge as “logical” whatever gives them desirable feelings and to seek constant proof that the man is suffering for love.

ultimatum (ultimatum) — In the author’s strategy, a final demand that forces a definite decision.

universal magnetism (magnetismo universal) — The force of attraction and repulsion that, following Eliphas Lévi, the author sees at work in all social relations.